P.S.—As the relative and comparative dates will show, the above letter was written, and sent to you for publication, before I saw Mr. J. Cogan Conway's letter in your last week's issue. That letter, in so far as it can be rightly classified at all, belongs to the discussion on "The Conference and the Churches," into which, by a fortunate chance, it has actually got, and not to the quite distinct question of "The Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund," in its particular relation to the Conference on the one hand and the so-called subscribers' meeting on the other; and I think it very important, if not absolutely necessary, to keep the discussion of these two questions quite separate from each other. Taken thus on its own merits, and in its own right class, without the slightest encroachment on the more general question, the subject now actually before us should be treated, as it is treated in my letter, as a question of concrete and pertinent facts, as a question of applied logic, and as a question of sound ethical principle and wise policy. (1) The salient facts are these: (a) The Conference originated the Pension and Insurance Fund; (b) The Conference, through its officers, conducted it up to the moment of its assured financial success; (c) At that moment, however, the management of the Fund was taken out of the hands of the Conference and usurped by a private company. (2) The logical question is this: (a) What is the logical connection, in general, among the steps thus indicated? (b) The logical connection between the first and the second is clear enough, but what is the logical connection between the second and the third? (c) Let those who have forced on the third step explain its logic in regard to the other two. (3) The question of sound ethical principle and wise policy may be stated thus: (a) On what principle of good morals, or wise policy, is it that the Conference, having started the Fund and made it successful, should then be compelled to hand it over to be thenceforth managed by a non-representative and private company? (b) On what good moral principle, or sound policy, did the subscribers' meeting thus take possession of the management of the Fund palpably belonging not to us, who are called subscribers, but to the Conference to which we openly gave our subscriptions? (c) On what good moral principle, or wise policy, is it that the Conference of our Free Churches, the only central representative body we have, should not have been entrusted, through its own duly elected and responsible officials, with the future management of its own Fund, instead of that Fund being incontinently seized and managed by a self-elected and irresponsible corporation?

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

Sir,—A reference to letters in The Inquirer, in which the idea of a Triennial Conference was developed and explained some twenty years ago, would clear up the confused notions revealed by some of your recent correspondents as to its aim and purpose. It was distinctly meant to be a deliberative, not an executive, body. It was to supply periodical opportunities for the exchange of views on matters in which its members had a common interest. The absence of organisation, save so much as would affect the necessary arrangements for successive meetings, clearly shows that it was meant only for the discussion of general principles, not for the establishment of definite institutions. That important practical suggestions have ensued from its meetings is to be gladly recognised. But they have properly been relegated for inquiry and investigation to distinct bodies, appointed for their special aptitudes, and charged with the responsibility of carrying them, when possible, into effect. Thus, the necessity for some improvement in the remuneration of our ministers being demonstrated in Liverpool, in 1882, the subject of the remedial measures to be adopted was left to a committee, whose operations were illustrated in the establishment of the Ministers' Sustentation Fund. It is obvious that such a task could not have been successfully undertaken by a large and miscellaneous meeting, called for purposes of conference and discussion.

Another illustration is supplied by the projection at the last meeting of a Ministers' Superannuation Fund. It was clearly necessary to refer the question to a body of experienced men in order to ascertain its practicability and promote its success. This being happily secured, it remained for the subscribers and donors to settle the trusts, appoint officers and committee, adopt rules and regulations, and carry on the work. To suppose that the Conference had any powers in this direction is surely a mistake. Only those who had subscribed the money could reasonably claim a share in its administration. If A and B give money for a certain purpose, how can C and D justify a demand to regulate its expenditure? I doubt whether the new movement could do better than follow the example of the Ministers' Funds, both "Augmentation" and "Sustentation," which have worked satisfactorily to their supporters for a good many years, and which make up their accounts and publish their reports annually or half-yearly to those who are entitled to receive them.

I commend to your readers the excellent letter by Mr. Cogan Conway in your last issue. In his conclusive argument I cordially concur.

Harry Rawson.

April 2, 1902.

Sir,—It is to be hoped that the Rev. A. Leslie Smith and those who agree with him will ask Mr. Cogan Conway's authority to speak in the name of the Conference before they accept his assertion that the Conference is quite as dogmatic as the B. and F.U.A. Mr. Cogan Conway is not the President that he should tell us ex cathedra what the Conference is or is not. It would have been more modest and less oracular if Mr. Cogan Conway's assertion had been prefaced by the words In my opinion. In order, therefore, not to offend in the same manner, may I say that in my opinion Mr. Cogan Conway has given an entirely misleading and inaccurate account of the basis of the Conference. He quotes the title as given in Rule I., "The National Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian and other non-subscribing and kindred churches," and asserts that the first word, "Unitarian," is the interpretation of all the rest. It would appear here, however, as in Acts of Parliament, the interpreting clause is to be found not at the beginning but at the end—and "other non-subscribing and kindred churches". The basis of the Conference is not Unitarianism but Non-Subscription, and how a non-subscribing association of churches can be a dogmatic association passes comprehension. The history of the Conference clearly proves that it is its non-subscribing character which is the essential thing. The title mentions Unitarian churches and Liberal Christian churches. Mr. Cogan Conway supposes that these are synonymous terms. Nothing of the kind. There are Liberal Christian churches which are not Unitarian, although they are non-subscribing, and it is within my own personal knowledge that such Liberal Christian churches have been invited to join the Conference, and it has been a disappointment that, with one exception, they should have declined. Further, it is to be noted that there are churches, not a few, within the Conference which repudiate for themselves the designation "Unitarian," as a betrayal of the spirit and the letter of the non-subscribing principle.

Mr. Conway winds up his letter with a would-be alarming fanfaranade, warning all and sundry against "the ascription to the Conference of an authority which it neither professes nor claims." It is a little difficult to understand, although it sounds big and terrifying, what "professing an authority" may mean. But, whatever it means, why this alarm, if, according to Mr. Cogan Conway's own account of the matter, the Conference does not profess it, still less claim it? When any body of men can be found who seek to turn the Conference into an authoritative or governing body for our churches, it will be time enough for Mr. Cogan Conway to blow his trumpet. It is not the friends and adherents of the non-subscribing principle who would impose "a yoke" on our churches, but those who would fasten upon them a dogmatic name. Mr. Cogan Conway seeks to frighten us out of our wits by setting up the bogey—a white sheet and turnip bogey if ever there was one—of what will happen if the Conference becomes an ecclesiastical and governing body. Seeing that nobody has any such design, Mr. Cogan Conway need not waste his breath. What many do desire is that the Conference should use its unique opportunities for the more adequate service of the churches by dealing with matters of practical urgency. It has already done this in the case of the Pension Fund. All honour to Mr. Cogan Conway for the labour he has thrown into the scheme. Yet he presents this singular spectacle, that while willing to use the name, prestige and influence of the Conference to further the scheme in which he himself is particularly interested, he would not have the Conference extend its labours in any other direction.

It is to be hoped that the attempt now on foot, and of which Mr. Cogan Conway's letter is an instance, to reduce the Conference to a condition of impotence for any good and practical work, will meet with the failure it deserves.

Birmingham. Joseph Wood.

Sir,—"The National Conference," so called for brevity's sake, consists by its title of "Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations." Surely, Mr. Conway's interpretation is erroneous. The word "other" implies that the Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, and Presbyterian congregations are amongst the "Non-Subscribing." Thus, the short title would be "National Conference of Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations." Such a Conference and such congregations are unique in Christendom. It is only for their doctrinal freedom and its possibilities for good that I am more interested in them than in any other churches. I wish to avoid the old discussion of names; I am most anxious about the thing itself.

But to avoid the usual argument at cross purposes, let me state with what meaning I use certain terms. "Unitarian," however broad in its significance, always excludes the idea of Trinitarian doctrine. The pronouns "we" and "us" refer to the members of a certain group of churches in their ecclesiastical capacity. These churches have "open trusts," and ecclesiastically ignore the difference between a Unitarian and a Trinitarian. "We," in this sense, do not require of our ministers and members the adoption of particular theological doctrines. This is the mark which distinguishes our churches from the rest of Christendom, and gives them a special mission in the world. That mission is to demonstrate the possibility of a high religious life, and an active church-life, free from the restrictions of creeds and fixed articles of belief.

How is the church-life of Great Britain and Ireland ultimately to be organised? The Established Church of England cannot last with its present constitution, and none of the orthodox churches provide a home for all the forces of religion. These varied forces can be combined and utilised only on our principles. If so, we must believe not only in freedom, but in combination.

It has been urged that our churches need not organisation, but life. I reply, that life shows itself in organisation, and the cry for organisation is a sign of life, trying to work itself out in profitable activity. Through our present want of system, enthusiasm is chilled by inadequate opportunities, and energy lies idle or runs to waste. In the trade of the world we see an increase in combination and organisation, due to the demands of economy and efficiency. A church is a combination of worshippers. A conference or federation of churches only carries the principle a step further. The question is, whether we consider our church-work to be sufficiently important that we will do it as thoroughly as our other business. Moreover, the organisation of churches is a means of caring for each individual member, and giving him a duty to perform for others. It means practical brotherhood, which we profess to regard as half the Christian gospel.

Some of our members think that the district societies are quite capable of supplying the place of a national society; but this view will scarcely, I think, bear examination. Only see what the National Conference has done! First, it has manifested the existence of the community which practises religion without creeds and without subscription to articles of belief. Secondly, it has done service to its constituent churches by the co-ordination of the district societies, the establishment of funds and the inauguration of the Guilds Union. These things could not have been so well done by the districts separately.

Similar and even greater tasks may be achieved by the Conference in the future. Some might be immediately suggested; but I must conclude this letter with one main thought which lies at the very root of these possibilities. The Conference will stand for an idea, the organisation of the churches of the nation—ay, of the world—in freedom from artificial restrictions. Besides the Unitarian Association for theological propaganda, there is need of a society, charged with the custody of our ecclesiastical principle and our ideal of religious fellowship. The Conference, under any change of form or name, will be a symbol of "Truth, Liberty, and Religion." It will make the principle of Manchester College and our churches known, as it ought to be known, to the nation and to the world.

OBITUARY.

MISS JANE H. GAIRDNER.

A brief tribute of kindly recognition and remembrance is due to Miss Jane Hannah Gairdner, who died rather suddenly of pneumonia early on Monday morning last, March 31, in Edinburgh. Miss Gairdner had been for many years past a faithful member of St. Mark's Chapel, and a staunch adherent of the principles of liberal religion. Gifted with a vigorous understanding, she was ever in search of information, and lost no opportunity of improving her mind. Her religion was of an eminently practical kind. Endowed with great energy and full of the desire of doing good, she was helpful in a high degree to all sick and suffering friends, and her visits will be missed in many a humble home. For a long time she took a deep interest in the work of the (unsectarian) United Industrial School, until its extinction, as being no longer needed, about a year ago. Miss Gairdner was the daughter of Mr. Robert Gairdner, a native of Ayrshire, but much of whose life was spent abroad, in India and Canada, and niece to the late Dr. W. Gairdner M.D., of Edinburgh. She is survived by an only brother, Mr. Robert Gairdner, of Dunedin, N.Z. The funeral service was conducted in St. Mark's Chapel by Rev. R. B. Drummond on Thursday.

MR. ARTHUR SHUTE.

Mr. Arthur Shute, whose death occurred on March 15, at his residence in Hope-street, Liverpool, was the youngest son of Stephen Shute, junior partner in the once noted firm Gibbs, Bright and Co., and was member of an old Devonshire family settled at Crediton, Devonshire. Early in life Mr. Stephen Shute removed to Liverpool, where he and his family were attached members of Renshaw-street Chapel for at least three-quarters of the last century. Early in life Arthur Shute entered into business in Liverpool and obtained moderate success as a merchant, gaining at the same time the respect and confidence of the leading men of the city. A man of cultivated tastes, he took little part in the public life of the city, but was deeply interested in the Liberal movement in religion, sympathising with the more conservative tendency in theology, and valuing the old traditions of English Presbyterianism. He earnestly supported the successive ministries of the Revs. J. H. Thom and Charles Beard, and for many years was secretary of the congregation, remaining on the Council to the end. The remains were interred in the churchyard of Edgehill, Liverpool, where several members of the family have been buried.

DR. JOHN KITTON HIRST-SMYTH.

We regret to record the sudden death of Dr. John Kitton Hirst-Smyth, who passed away on Monday, March 24, while visiting a patient. He was in his 31st year, unmarried, and the eldest son of Dr. J. D. Hirst-Smyth, of London, who was formerly minister of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich. Having obtained the degree of Licentiate of the Society of Apothecaries, he took up medical practice at Whitworth, near Rochdale. There he began to take an interest in matters connected with the higher branches of education, and succeeded in establishing the Whitworth Field Naturalists' Society, of which he was president up to the time of his death. A recent movement for planting trees in the Whitworth district was largely the result of his efforts, and he was endeavouring to spread a knowledge of botany among school-children. He was of a retiring disposition and combined with his professional qualifications an active practical sympathy which made him a welcome visitor. Being called to attend a patient in the middle of night, he rose and went as quickly as possible; and, having performed this duty, was about to leave the house, when he staggered, and, being laid on the sofa, expired before medical assistance could be obtained. For several years he had been suffering from an affection of the heart. The painfulness of his death at so early an age has been somewhat relieved by the circumstances under which it occurred. He was a member of the Unitarian congregation at Rochdale, but the distance and his professional duties prevented his regular attendance. The body was brought to Norwich and interred at the Rosary, the service being conducted by the Rev. A. Hall.

Good Words for this month contains a third paper by Mr. Stopford Brooke on "Browning's Treatment of Nature," which closes on a familiar note. After quoting the lovely lyric from "Paracelsus" beginning

Thus the Mayne glideth
Where my love abideth,

the article concludes:—

"My heart, they loose my heart, those simple words," cried Paracelsus, and he was right. They tell of that which to see and love is better, wiser, than to probe and know all the problems of knowledge. But that is a truth not understood, not believed. And few there be who find it. And if Browning had found the secret of how to live more outside of his understanding than he did, or had not forgotten it, he would not, perhaps, have spoken more wisely for the good of man, but he would have written better poetry more continuously.

In the Sunday Magazine it is announced that in the May number Miss Stone will commence a narrative of her life among the Brigands. Harper contains an illustrated article by Dr. Morris Jastrow, jr., in "The Palace and Temple of Nebuchadnezzar," showing in a most interesting manner the results of recent German excavations in ancient Babylon. In a very different field are the four characteristic pictures by Mr. Edwin A. Abbey, R.A., in illustration of Goldsmith's "Deserted Village."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

In looking over some old books one day I found a little story which was so interesting that I stood beside the bookcase reading till I had finished it; and I thought you would like to hear it—especially as it is about a cat. The story is in verse, but, as the dialect was odd, I will tell you the tale in prose.

The man who tells the story was a sailor, Tom, who had left the sea ten years before, and he says that the last of his ships was the Annabel Lee, on which there was a steward named Jim Lord. Jim was very fond of animals, and he always took out with him five or six, to whom he used to teach the "rummiest tricks"; he loved all his pets, but of none of them did he seem quite so fond as of a cat that he had saved from a pond, where she was trying to swim with a stone round her neck.

Now Tom, the sailor, says that he and this cat didn't agree; she used to trot up and down the deck, and would get in the way of the crew; and at last one day, when Tom was shifting some kegs, she came and pushed in between his legs, and tripped him up, and he fell flat, upon which Tom jumped up in a rage and said, "Plague the cat! you don't never do that again," and picked up pussie and pitched her into the sea. His mates roared out, "Cat overboard! Jim Lord, someone's been chucking your cat overboard!"

Jim ran to the taffrail and saw it was true, for there was Pussy swimming within sight; and Jim ran to the captain and cried, "Cap'n, some brute's been and throwed the cat in the sea! Will you stop the ship, Sir, and lower a boat?"

But the captain said, "Jim Lord, I've been afloat nigh forty years, and of all the fools I ever did see in all that time you are the biggest, to think that any captain would stop a 'liner' to pick up a cat."

So Jim said, "Cap'n, then you're bound to stop to pick up me!" and in an instant he was over the taffrail and into the sea. This time the cry was "Man overboard!"

Well, the captain went white with rage, but he was bound to stop the ship and lower a boat. Tom says,—

"In less than five minutes we had her afloat (Though I felt every minute were like an age).
. . . well, Jim Picks up the cat and we picks up him."

And Tom goes on to say that it would have done your heart good to hear how the crew and the passengers cheered. And the captain said he would put Jim in irons for a week or more. But the crew got the mate to beg Jim off, and the passengers got one gentleman to beg him off also. So the mate and Sir Richard went to the captain and begged and argued for Jim, till, at last, the captain gave way, and said he would let Jim off the punishment, but he should never sail under him any more.

Then Sir Richard went to Jim to tell him, and he added "I respect your kindness and your pluck, and I don't like to see them bring you ill luck. So if you are tired of living at sea and would like a place where there are animals, and where you can teach them your ways—why, my old park-keeper is just dead, and the place is yours if you would like it." And Jim gladly agreed to the plan, and at the end of the voyage became the park-keeper.

Then Tom finishes his story by telling how that evening he went to Jim Lord and said to him, "It was all my fault that you had that swim; and now I axe your pardon, and I hope to get it." And Jim answered, "Tom, it's an easy thing for you to get that; what you want is the pardon of this here cat." And he picked her up,—

"an' he say to her "Kitty,
This is the man tried to drown you, my pretty:
He don't know your lingo, Kitty,' says he,
'So you says to him what you says through me.
You tells him as life's as sweet a thing,
And dying as hard, to a cat as a king;
You tells him it might have been God's plan
To have made him the cat and have made you the man;
And you ask him how he'd have felt if he Had been took by you and chucked in the sea;
You ask him, Kitty, to think of that
Next time as he'd harm a poor little cat;
And then you gives him your pardon,' says he,
'And you gives him your paw.'"

And then Tom continues,—

"'Well, Kitty,' says I,
'As I take it, the two of you's taught Tom Bligh
A lesson I hopes he'll never forget.'"

And Tom adds that he hasn't forgotten it yet, though it is ten years since he left the sea; and in order not to forget, he went to a comrade who did the ship's painting, and said, "Bill, will you paint me a picture?" and he said, "That I will." So Tom says,

"Just paint me that cat there a-paddling at sea,
And Jim Lord a-swimming to save her, and we
A-pulling our arms off to pick up Jim,
And the Annabel Lee a-standing to."

"And," says Tom, "I know he's painted them true, though a London artist who came here, painting sheep and such rubbish last year, called it a daub; but I told him flat, if he can paint a picture like that—a picture to do a man's feelings some good—well, I wish he would."

A WORDSWORTH QUOTATION.

Sir,—My attention has been called to the misprinting of one word in Wordsworth's noble line about Newton, quoted in the little piece about Birds, in your last week's issue. It is the word "scenes" which ought to have been "seas." The mistake so grievously mars the poet's splendid metaphor that I venture to beg you to insert the correction, with an apology to all lovers of poetic truth for one's carelessness in correcting the proof—or for the unpardonable sin of illegible caligraphy! Perhaps you may even spare room for the whole sentence in which the line occurs. It is in the "Prelude," Book III., lines 58-63, where Wordsworth is telling of his residence at Cambridge:—

"And from my pillow, looking forth by light
Of moon or favouring stars, I could behold
The antechapel where the statue stood
Of Newton with his prism and silent face,
The marble index of a mind for ever
Voyaging through strange seas of Thought, alone."

THE NEW EDUCATION BILL.

There have been so many Education Bills under discussion in recent years, and the number of people who take any serious interest in the controversies of the experts is so small, that it is to be hoped the Bill now introduced into the House of Commons will receive the earnest and thoughtful attention of the friends of civil and religious liberty. Regarded in one way it is an exceedingly feeble measure ; it is a permissive Bill, and nothing may come of it, so far as elementary education is concerned, if the county or borough council declines to take any action ; and if a resolution to adopt its provisions is once rejected by any council, no further resolution can be submitted until after the expiration of three years. In the event of the Bill passing in its present form, there is a prospect of confusion, controversy, and chaos all over the country for years to come.

But looked at in another way, the Bill is a far-reaching attempt to deal with the Education question on broad and national lines. There are many people who could have borne the pain of seeing School Boards, as now elected and constituted, abolished, if by this means a thoroughly representative and wholesome system for the management and control of education throughout the length and breadth of the land could be established. It matters little about names, and not so much, perhaps, as some of us may have thought about ad hoc elections, provided the real voting power of the people can be effectively brought to bear upon those charged with the care of education. If the local education authority in properly defined areas had been placed in direct and supreme control, the members of School Boards might have welcomed the new order of things. But under the proposed scheme, unless the county councils are able to secure the genuine representation of each locality on the committees which are to be the responsible administrators of elementary education, the change will certainly not be for the better.

The section of the Bill, which deals with what is called "Higher Education," is satisfactory so far as it goes, but it does not go very far. The local education authority may spend the whisky money, and impose a twopenny rate, or apply for a provisional order to impose a higher rate for the maintenance of secondary, technical, and evening schools ; but there is no security given that the thorough organisation and adequate provision of secondary education shall be obligatory on the authority. This is a need so pressing, in view of the high standard of other nations, and the competition our people have to face, that it has already been strongly urged that the Government should drop the section of their Bill which is concerned with elementary education, and concentrate their whole strength, and that of all true friends of education, on carrying through a really effective measure of secondary education.

Another point to be noted is that Mr. Balfour in his speech referred to the crying need for the more ample and satisfactory training of teachers, but nothing appears in the Bill on this subject, not even the abolition of the theological and ecclesiastical tests at existing colleges which obtain nearly their whole support from Government grants, supplemented by the fees of the students.

If the Bill as a whole is pressed, controversy will naturally centre round the Elementary Education clauses. The supporters of denominational schools are clamouring for the omission of the permissive clause. No wonder, for if the provisions of the Bill were applied throughout England, the ratepayers would be called upon to find annually about two millions sterling for the maintenance of these privately managed sectarian schools. That is something worth trying for, and no one need be surprised that the bishops and the clergy are praying that the Act may be made compulsory. It is not the expenditure of the money that is objectionable, doubtless it is needed ; and it is high time that those towns and districts which have selfishly shirked their duties for years past should be made to contribute their fair share towards the cost of educating the children. But it does seem a perversion of justice and equity for the public to find the money, and the denominationalists to spend it.

The local authority is required to maintain and keep efficient all public elementary schools within its area. In regard to the 8,000 parishes in which the Anglican Church school is the only available school, the monopoly is left undisturbed. A community made up in not a few instances of a majority of Nonconformists will have to pay the whole cost of maintenance out of the rates, with a public representation which shall not exceed one-third on the body of managers. Are the descendants of the men who resisted the payment of Church Rates going to submit to this new imposition? The power to inspect, to issue directions as to the secular instruction, and the audit of the accounts are right and good ; but the local authority is not allowed to raise any objection to filling the schools with teachers belonging to one church and professing one creed. This perpetuation of the imposition of theological tests upon teachers is one of the worst features of the Bill.

The clauses relating to the provision of new schools are very unsatisfactory. They appear to be drafted not in the interests of the community or of education, but to protect and promote denominational interests. The Board of Education will consider the objections raised by the ratepayers, and in giving a decision will be guided by the wishes of the parents, and the desire for economy of the rates. This last provision will enable the Board of Education to allow an unsuitable denominational school to occupy the place of a properly-equipped public school.

In the case of schools taken over by the local authorities or provided by them the control is more effective, but it is not by any means effective enough. The council will act through an education committee, and a majority of its members will be appointed by the council ; but the nominations of other bodies have to be accepted, and the Board of Education are understood to have given guarantees that certain "interests," ecclesiastical and other, will certainly be represented before the scheme receives approval. The Bill fails to provide a representative authority sufficiently in touch with the judgment and sentiment of the people to ensure effective management, or provide for the liberty of the teacher, the wishes of the parents, or the needs of the children. Mr. Balfour expressed the hope that the Bill would put an end to religious controversy ; it only transfers it from one arena to another. The controversy is likely, under this Bill, to become more bitter and heated than ever. It will continue until all schools supported by public money are publicly managed. Nevertheless, if the denominational managers had been allowed a representation of one-third, and the ratepayers two-thirds, the compromise for the sake of peace might have been accepted by the friends of civil and religious liberty.

How the provisions of the Bill in the matter of denominational religious teaching appear to average High Church opinion may be seen from the following extract from an article in the Guardian, which is on the whole strongly favourable to the acceptance of the Government measure :—

> Finally, there is the grave omission of any provision for denominational teaching in schools provided by the local authority. We regret, as much as any one can, that Mr. Balfour has not had the courage to carry out consistently the principle which he professed and has in part embodied in the Bill, that "the wishes of the parents" are to be considered. But we are not prepared to make this omission a ground for opposing a measure which already gives us much that we have asked for, and may, before it assumes its final form, give us more. The omission itself may be rectified, but it is more important to note that the Bill, as it stands and still more as it is designed by the Government, provides for the need in a way which, though economically unsatisfactory, is from a religious point of view far more efficient than the permission to give denominational teaching in an undenominational school. Churchmen are agreed that religious education is not a matter of a "religious half-hour" a day, but of the tone and influence of the whole school day in a school in which religion is the chief element. The Bill allows the Church and other religious bodies, under certain restrictions, which need further definition, to provide such schools where they are needed; and if we are not to have everything, we confess that we would rather go without the power of imparting Church teaching in "undenominational" schools, than the power of founding new Church schools.

To us, on the contrary, it appears lamentable that such denominational considerations should be the determining motive in the ordering of national education. If such a sectarian ideal should be carried into effect, it would be necessary throughout the country to at least duplicate the schools in thousands of parishes, at enormous expense, and at far more serious expense of educational efficiency, bringing division into the children's lives, where there should be unity, accentuating unwholesome differences, not because the children or their parents desired it (for "the wishes of the parents" are to a great extent merely a clerical stalking-horse) —but at the dictation of sectarian intolerance.

Strenuous opposition to the Government's Education Bill is being organised by several representative bodies of those who set the ideal of a thoroughly efficient system of national education above any denominational or other sectional interests.

Thus the Educational and Organising Committee of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches at a joint meeting unanimously passed the following resolution:—

That this Committee, having carefully considered the Education Bill introduced by the Government, strongly condemns its provisions, among other grave reasons:—

1. Because it proposes an education authority which, so far as its constitution is concerned, is in no wise representative, is not responsible to the public, and will be largely controlled by sectional interests, and which is peculiarly unsuited to take the place of School Boards as the authority for elementary education.

2. Because it provides for the maintenance of the voluntary schools out of the rates, unaccompanied by any real and effective public control.

3. Because, while it confirms the Ecclesiastical ascendency in thousands of schools, from which Nonconformists have suffered in the past, the proposals as to the erection of new schools, which are offered as mitigating this injustice, will, in practice, prove to be largely inoperative, would generally be educationally mischievous, and would lead to the multiplication of sectarian schools at the public cost.

4. It was further resolved to hold a conference of representatives from Free Church Councils in England and Wales on April 15 to further consider the Bill, and to make arrangements for combined action in opposition to it.

The committee of the National Education Association, of which Mr. A. J. Mundella is the secretary, at a largely attended meeting, with Mr. E. F. M. MacCarthy, of Birmingham, in the chair, resolved as follows:—

That the National Education Association condemn the Government Bill on education on the following among other grounds:—1. It fails to create a representative authority to manage education locally. It deprives county and borough councils of their present right to constitute their committees without interference; and subjects their action in this respect to the absolute control of the Board of Education, and the compulsory admission of representatives of external organisations and interests.

2. It puts the whole cost of maintenance of schools under private management on public funds, and fails to transfer the management whilst transferring the burden to a public authority.

3. It does not get rid of religious controversies, but forces them upon borough and county councils.

4. It perpetuates the present ecclesiastical monopoly in 8,000 parishes, and the suggested concessions in Clauses 9 and 10 are illusory, impracticable, and wasteful.

5. It establishes an area for the management of elementary education which is too wide and unworkable.

6. It tends to increase rather than diminish the pressure of the unjust system of religious tests in the teaching profession.

7. It imposes an additional annual charge of at least £2,000,000 on the rates, without giving the representatives of the ratepayers the fullest control and management of the schools so aided.

8. While submitting these essential objections to the Bill under consideration, the National Education Association reaffirms its opinion that the interests of education demand that there should be popularly-elected bodies in every part of the country, and that these authorities should be directly elected for the purposes of education and have only educational duties to perform.

And the Northern Counties Education League, of which Mr. Hirst Hollowell is the secretary, at a meeting in Manchester, resolved:—

That this meeting of the Council and Executive of the Northern Counties Education League, having considered the provisions of the Education Bill now before Parliament, is of opinion that the Bill is bad in principle and for the following reasons should be opposed at every stage: Because it proposes the abolition of School Boards, popularly elected authorities that have served the country well, with an increased efficiency; because it replaces School Boards by authorities not directly representative or responsible to the people at large; because, while proposing to combine secondary and elementary education, the Bill does not compel the new authority to provide facilities for secondary education, nor supply them with adequate funds where the council desire to make such provision. The Bill, therefore, fails to secure the continuous education of the talented children of the working classes. Because the Bill proposes to levy rates from the whole community for separate schools in which the public that must find the entire cost of maintenance would have no real control; because the permission apparently given for the provision of undenominational schools out of public funds is hedged about by such conditions as to make it practically useless; because the Bill will nearly double the charges laid upon the ratepayers while denying them efficient control over the expenditure of their money. This League desires to thank those members of Parliament who voted against the introduction of the Bill, and calls upon all members of Parliament to reject the measure and thus prepare the way to a just and statesmanlike reorganisation of education on national and unsectarian lines.

"WHERE DEEP SEAS MOAN."

Sark is a holiday resort of "pure delight" to all who love Nature unspoilt by the din of holiday crowds. It is the acknowledged beauty of the Channel group of islands, even to casual visitors. But to know it as it ought to be known is not to run over it in a day. That is to see only the salient points, the lions of the place. At least a fortnight is required to explore Sark thoroughly; and there are people who spend long summers in the island and still find new vistas of beauty day after day. To many minds it is more satisfying and inspiring to know a few places, perhaps even one place, well, than to run all over the world in a cursory and casual manner.

Sark lies about seven miles from Guernsey; and it may be reached from there in an hour. As one nears the coast and sees the great crags and dark cliffs, it is difficult to realise that in the midst of the island are valleys of tall trees and dreaming brooks; and meadows where yellow irises grow, and blue forget-me-nots. One special valley lies between cliffs which are thick with bracken and heather, and it winds down to the bay of Dixcart, white sanded, where the sea is clear as crystal, and on summer days blue as a deep rich sapphire. Then Sark has two wide moorlands: Les Laches, overlooking the quaint nest of a harbour with its pool, its entrance tunnelled through the cliff, and its picturesque boats; and the Eperquerie, at the north of the island, where the turf is short and soft, and one looks away over the infinitude of sea to Alderney. This wild enchanting common breaks off into precipitous heights. At the edge of the cliff there stands a cottage: its thatched roof is bound across with iron; its window is a mere pane stuck deep into the wall; it has but one room and a loft.

It lends to the lonely grandeur and strength of the Eperquerie an added note of weirdness. At night the fisherman's wife places a candle behind the little pane, and its feeble light shows her white face and anxious eyes, for, even in high summer, danger haunts her man out amongst the treacherous currents.

Sark also has its Pass, joining the larger island to a small one, which has its own special charm of height and moorland and wild rock-world. This Coupée Pass is at all times great, and very beautiful; but on a still night when the moon rides like a silver boat in the vault of sky, and a pearly mist lies over the sea, then is the Coupée a bridge of dreamland, dividing two seas of wonder and mystic beauty, The one is dark, still and deep, lying close against the cliff, three hundred feet down, moaning and tragic. The soft moonlight falls in a flood of radiance over the other side, where lies a bay encircled by rocks; here the sand is hard and shines like silver, and the sea gulls cry night and day. The one side is a tragedy, the other a vision of happy love.

Grassy peninsulas jut out in many parts of the cliffs. And Sark has its two pine woods, miniature it may be, but none the less real true woods. In one of them stands the little homely church; on Sundays it is good to lie under the murmuring hush of the trees and listen to the singing of the hymns from the church, where often in summer one has a musical treat, if visitors play the harmonium and take over the service. The other pine wood begins at the summit of a cliff, where it looks down into Saignie Bay and over Les Autelets, gigantic piles of rock, like massive altars. Follow it inland, and it leads to an ivy-grown, sheltered hollow, an ideal fairy-tale spot. One is still under its whispering spell as a path is crossed into the Seigneurie, the estate of the Lord of Sark. The wood borders a wide lawn; it descends a hilly bank of grass and hart's-tongue ferns; it shades a path by a lake which is wild and thick with foreign plants and water-lilies. Then it makes its way down to Port du Moulin Bay, rising tall and cathedral-like, till it mounts the cliff again to a resting-place.

But, after all, it is the coast of Sark that is so full of charm, for there are the caves, each with its own beauties and peculiarities of structure and colouring. Everyone has heard of the Gouliots, a noble series of caverns. The innermost of them is a shrine of Nature's own making, a place where one is constrained to be still and adore, a holy of holies in the heart of a cathedral. It is lofty and dark in its recesses, where a deep unfathomed pool lies hidden. Its outlook to the sea is through a rocky channel, whose floor is rose-pink, whose steep walls are covered with hosts of tiny golden anemones, sparkling with gems of sea water. And the rippling waves enter softly, translucent, musical.

One of the most delightful expeditions of a holiday in Sark is to take a boat with two fishermen guides and make le tour de l'île. There are caves to be entered the whole round of the coast. To describe them in detail would need a separate article.

The whole atmosphere of Sark is full of rest; its people, proud, independent, and faithful, are never in a hurry, and its sweet cottages bear out the truth of Ruskin's words of the "joy of humble life." The dialect is slow and expressive, the quaint old Norman-French. The laws are feudal, practically. Most of the people are French Methodists, and attend the tiny chapel in La Ville, the only hamlet of the island.

Then there is the enthralling spell of the Sark seas, of colour ineffable, of clearness that is brilliant:—

All round, no soul, no boat, no hail;
But on the horizon's verge descried,
Hangs, touch'd with light, one snowy sail!

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association was held on Good Friday at Todmorden. At the morning service the Rev. R. T. Herford, of Stand, took the place of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal as the preacher.

In the course of his sermon, which was on "The Crucifixion," Mr. Herford said that according to orthodoxy Jesus by his death made salvation possible to all mankind. His crucifixion is thought of as the most tremendous event in history. Hence the solemnity with which Good Friday is observed. What significance has the day for Unitarians? What is there left in the crucifixion but a martyr's death like that of many others? Who knows the mind of God sufficiently to know what He meant exactly by any particular event in history? Orthodox dogma is a speculation incapable of proof. It is a pure speculation. The great lesson is in the agony of Gethsemane. "Thy will be done" were amongst the greatest words Jesus spoke: sorrowful unto death; but brave and reconciled to his fate, having given himself wholly and utterly into the hands of his Father. Sacrifice on the part of God is unintelligible. Good Friday is something more than a day of mournful remembrance, although it must be a weak reverence of him which can draw an estimate of his worth without a picture of his physical death. If he were incarnate God we could not think of him as a man of real sorrows. We must remember not only a death bravely met; but also a life lived with God.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

In the afternoon the business meeting was held, the Rev. P. M. Higginson presiding. Regret was expressed by the Chairman, and endorsed by the meeting, that the Rev. S. A. Steinthal was unable, through the illness of his wife, to preside over the meeting. The Chairman went on to say that, after a long absence in the Holy Land and in Egypt, he had for a few months past been at home, but still had been something of a wanderer. He had gone to various churches to hear what was preached, and what spiritual influences were in the air in churches outside their own. He went to a very remarkable series of addresses by Archdeacon Wilson in a week in Lent at St. Ann's, Manchester, on "The Doctrine of the Atonement." He found the Archdeacon pleading for a modification of the old doctrine of the Atonement; a modification from the old idea of God, far off, remote, above mankind, to the idea of an immanent God, a God who lives in men; and he protested against the old forms of doctrine, which he held to be an abuse of the true doctrine of the Atonement. Then he read some startling lines to this effect from "Hymns Ancient and Modern," No. 97:—

Thus the work for our salvation
He ordained to be done;
To the traitor's art opposing
Art yet deeper than his own;
Thus the remedy procuring
Whence the fatal wound begun.

The Archdeacon disapproved of the doctrine, and expressed regret at its appearance in the book. Then he had listened to the addresses given in the Eccles Parish Church, when the ordinary evening service was over, by representative men of different Churches, who sought to show the strong points of their own Churches and their contributions to the common Christianity. Many of them would remember the brave words of Canon Cremer on the Unitarian movement. The Canon held it right to defer to the wish of the Bishop that Principal Gordon should not speak, but he himself gave an address on the subject which was to have been Principal Gordon's. Nothing could be more significant than this of the signs of the time. Quite as interesting to him as Canon Cremer's own short address on the services of Unitarianism to the common Christianity had been the breadth of his sermons at the ordinary evening services. He was told that this was an exceptional case, and that the old doctrines in very crude form still remained in many places. He thought they as teachers in Sunday schools and as managers, having to deal with young people, should keep their eyes open to these things and not allow themselves to live with any misconception of the matter. They must not allow themselves to believe that all the world was coming round to exactly their own Unitarian position, and on the other hand they must be careful to see they were not merely flogging a dead horse. They should not attack forms of doctrine which appealed to men's hearts to-day, but rather they should try to recognise as far as possible that which was common ground. He thought they had something to learn as well as to teach. They should not live in a fool's paradise and think that the world was becoming Unitarian after their own type and that all were coming to be like themselves. There was a temptation to say—Well, but those who are thinking these things in the Church of England and in various so-called orthodox bodies have no right to be thinking them there; they ought to come out, they are not conscientious; they are trifling with their obligations. He thought that for them it would be untruthful and insincere to undertake those obligations, holding the opinions they did, but it was very difficult. Theirs was a great inheritance of liberty. They might be thankful that their Free Churches had been able to pass quite naturally, quite simply, and without reserve, from an older form of thought which none of them held to-day to the larger views which now prevailed. They were not to judge others. "It is ours," said the Chairman, "always to remember that there is much in a church besides the doctrine. It is a place of worship, a place of holy thought and sympathy; the ritual itself has a deep hold on the hearts of those who have grown up in it, and it is a very hard thing to pull up the roots of our religious life even to plant them in a freer land." He pleaded that they should recognise as broadly as they possibly could and with great thankfulness this widening of the old orthodoxies.

The fifty-seventh annual report of the Committee said that the work accomplished during the first year of the new century had been characterised by much energy and vitality, and continued:—

The Association is to be congratulated on its good fortune in having, for a second term of office, secured the valuable services as president of the Rev. S. A. Steinthal. Mr. Steinthal is a life-long servant of the Association, and so early as the year 1851-2 occupied a position as one of the visitors. His period of office as president has coincided with the passing of the old and the dawning of the new century, and the Committee gratefully recognise how much of the work accomplished is due to his business like capacities, to his energy and enthusiasm, and to the widespread and well-earned influence he exerts not only in the Manchester district but also in the shaping of the best work that pulses through our national life. The Committee rejoice that, after a service of half a century in our cause, he is still permitted to work amongst us, with a vitality and energy not equalled in many younger men. The Committee express to him a deep sense of their reverent respect for the example he sets us in his life as a courteous and kindly Christian gentleman.

The report reviewed in detail the different departments of the work, and had the following reference to the "long-service medals":—

Mr. Cuthbert C. Grundy finds that the long-service medals are thought so much of by many of the recipients of them, and that there is much disappointment in the case of Sunday-school workers who are entitled to these souvenirs but who have failed to receive them, that he has decided to continue the presentation of the medals. In order to simplify matters, all the medals awarded will be silver ones, and will be given to teachers and other officers who have served in Sunday-school work for twenty-five years, and who are still actively engaged in a Sunday-school of the Association; always provided in the case of "other officers" that for at least fifteen years out of the twenty-five they have been Sunday-school teachers. Further, any bronze medalist who has since the receipt of the medal completed twenty-five years of service, and is still working in a Sunday-school of the Association, will receive a silver medal in exchange for the bronze one. Fully verified applications are to be sent in to Mr. D. A. Little. It is proposed to distribute the medals at the Good Friday meeting in 1903.

In regard to finances, the general account showed an adverse balance of £58, and there was also an adverse balance of £14 on the seaside home account. Sixty-five schools have subscribed in the year, as against 63 in 1900 and 53 in 1899.

On the motion of the Chairman, the report and financial statement were adopted; and the committee, treasurer, and secretaries having been elected, a vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. R. T. Herford for his sermon.

The following representatives of kindred associations were welcomed:—The Sunday School Association, Mr. Ion Pritchard; London Sunday School Society, Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope; London and South-Eastern Sunday School Union, Rev. Frederic Allen; Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union, Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A.; North Midland Sunday School Association, Rev. W. Griffiths, Ph.D.

EVENING MEETING.

A large public meeting was held in the schoolroom in the evening, under the presidency of Mr. James Crabtree.

In opening the proceedings the Chairman said they were glad to welcome the Association to Todmorden again after an absence of eighteen years. It had been a pleasure to see the members of the Association in their new and handsome church and in their extended school.

The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed (Padiham) proposed the warm thanks of the Association to the members of the Todmorden Church and to the minister, trustees, and congregation of the Methodist Free Church, who had given their schoolroom for the purpose of luncheon and tea.

The Rev. George Evans (Gorton) seconded the resolution, which was passed, and the Mayor of Todmorden was thanked for opening his grounds at Scaitcliffe to the members of the Association.

The Rev. Henry Rawlings (York) then gave an address on "Naughty Boys and Girls." He declined, to begin with, to define the word "naughty"—they all knew it in its infinite varieties—and laid down certain rules for the guidance of teachers. One of them was that they should frankly acknowledge to themselves that naughty scholars in their classes were in some respects the most important, and that in any case there must be bestowed upon them special study and careful attention. This was not the tendency of the "natural man" in the teacher—be the teacher man or woman—but from the point of view of their own comfort they could not ignore the naughty. A second rule laid down for the guidance of the teacher was "Do not fear, or at least show no signs of fear." Many teachers were timorous, and he had known strong men who would rather enter on the battlefield than take charge on a Sunday of the dozen of the species boy. "Bubbling fountains of iniquity" was a description which had been given of a class of boys. By being resolute and unwavering the control they wished for might be obtained.

Mr. J. Wigley (Manchester) followed with an address on the same subject. He declared that, in his opinion, there were no naughty boys in the dictionary sense—the sense, that is, of being wicked, corrupt. But there were very many who were mischievous, troublesome, difficult to manage. They were wicked in a sinless sense, and could be dealt with by a firm teacher, but a teacher who yet showed a kindly tolerance.

The meeting, on the motion of the Rev. A. W. Fox, seconded by Rev. J. C. Hirst (Liverpool), passed a resolution expressing deep sympathy with Mr. Steinthal in his domestic affliction.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of this Association was held on Easter Monday at the new Narborough Road Church, Leicester. A considerable number of delegates and other workers were present from the various schools, as well as the ministers of the district and the Rev. F. Allen from London, and the Rev. W. Harrison from the Manchester District. This was the first occasion upon which the Association had been entertained by the Leicester Free Christian School, and special pleasure was given on this occasion both to visitors who had not had the opportunity of viewing the new buildings, and to the Narborough-road friends, who were now in a better position to welcome the Association than formerly.

The proceedings began with an impressive service conducted by the Rev. E. G. Evans, of Chesterfield. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. M. Ll. Thomas, of Nottingham.

Taking for text 1 Tim. iv. 16, "Take heed to thyself and to thy teaching," the sermon opened with a vigorous denunciation of the Government's Education Bill, as a menace to the moral and religious life of the country, threatening to betray society into the hands of a clerical faction; and then proceeded to urge the need of greater efficiency than ever in the religious teaching of the Sunday-schools. Parents had a duty to their children, the preacher said, which must not be neglected. They must not be left without direct spiritual nourishment and religious guidance from their natural guardians. If parents did nothing, outside influences were busily at work constantly making impressions on the child's mind, and it would grow up either with wrong prejudices or right preferences. The young soul could not remain a vacuum, and was perpetually being filled with some content. Thus the futility of the let-alone policy was proved, the choice was not whether a child should receive his parents' religious instruction or none, but that or some other. Thus they must see to it that their children received the right teaching. Not to decide what they should receive was really to decide that they should become the victims of the nearest and most powerful competitor among the rival sects. As they held religious principles dear, they must impart them to their children, and save them from rising up in judgment in after years against those who were their rightful teachers and guides to the higher life. In conclusion, Mr. Thomas gave an eloquent delineation of the true ideal of religious teaching and of the influence of a good teacher upon the children's lives.

The following extract from the Committee's report will give some idea of the condition of the school work in the district:—

The Committee desires to take this opportunity of congratulating the teachers and other workers in the Schools, upon the vigorous condition and real success which have evidently attended their efforts during the year. It will be seen from an examination of the tables of figures at the end of this report, that the numbers of the scholars in the schools of this district (2,201) are larger than they have been for some years past, and this, notwithstanding that there have been slight decreases in seven of the schools. May we not take this as a clear sign that the earnestness and determined zeal of our workers are about to be rewarded, and that the disappointing decline of certain past years is now to be changed to a period of steady increase? But there is still a great deal of loss to make up. We do not yet stand as high as in the year 1891, when the figures reached 2,208. The latter year gives the largest figures on record, with the exception of the year 1876, with which, however, no comparison can be made, as two schools were then included which do not now belong to the district. It is quite true that the welfare of the schools cannot be accurately gauged by the figures of increase or decrease, and it is well known to the Committee that the finest results are being won by devoted and patient workers in some of the cases where a decrease in numbers has to be reported; and our aim should always be efficiency, rather than numbers. At the same time, the Committee would urge upon the attention of teachers the fact here mentioned.

The moral of the report was emphasised with much force by the retiring President, the Rev. W. G. Price. For the ensuing year there is to be a lady President, Miss Catherine Gittins, of Leicester Great Meeting.

At the Conference which closed the proceedings, a most interesting and forcible paper was read by the Rev. Dr. Griffiths, of Ilkeston, on "The Bible in the Senior Classes."

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the subscribers and friends was held at the Mission, Mill-street, on Wednesday evening, March 26.

Mr. Walter Holland, the President, occupied the chair, and was supported on the platform and in the audience by, among others, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, H. W. Hawkes, W. J. Jupp, L. de B. Klein, T. Lloyd Jones, H. D. Roberts and A. Leslie Smith, Mrs. George Holt, Miss Holt, Miss Bowring, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Bowring, Messrs. P. H. Holt, R. D. Holt, Arnold Rathbone, Richard Robinson, Charles W. Jones, G. H. Ball, Richard D. Holt, Walter Coventry, F. Bowring, Miss Florence Melly, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Hall, Mr. and Mrs. F. Robinson, Mr. R. W. Manning, Mr. B. P. Burroughs, and the Hon. Sec., Mr. Harold Coventry.

Letters were received from, or on behalf of, Mr. A. F. Warr, M.P., Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P.. Rev. A. E. Parry, Mrs. Mulleneux, Sir Edward Russell, Sir W. H. Tate, Bart., Councillors H. C. Rathbone and Willink, Mr. Tom Cook and Mr. A. S. Thew.

The Committee's annual report was read by the Hon. Secretary, and alluded, in the first place, in sympathetic terms to the death of Mr. William Rathbone, mentioning the fact that he had acted as President of the Mission, and also had provided an additional assistant missionary for several years at his own expense. The Committee at their meeting on March 12 had passed a memorial resolution placing on record their gratitude for Mr. Rathbone's long services to the Mission, and expressing "their acknowledgment of the inestimable value which his example and encouragement have been in this as in so many other practical and philanthropic efforts for the improvement of the moral and social condition of the neglected poor."

The report referred to the question of building upon the plot of land adjoining the Mission, and said that after long and anxious consideration the Committee recommended the erection of a building to contain class rooms and suitable accommodation for a girls' gymnasium. The cost was estimated at £1,400 and the Committee appealed for generous support to enable them to carry out the scheme.

The report also referred with regret to the loss sustained by the Committee in the removal to Manchester of one of their colleagues, Mr. Richard Robinson.

The Treasurer's statement of accounts, read by Mr. Forwood Heyn, the Deputy Treasurer, showed a balance of about £111 due to the Treasurer, the regular income of the Society falling short of the normal expenditure by some £175 per annum.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, referred to the loss sustained by the Mission in the death of Mr. Rathbone, who, he thought, took even greater interest in this than in other philanthropic work, partly because he was associated in it with the late Mr. Thom, and also because he was following in the footsteps of his father, who was the first president of the Mission on its foundation in 1836. Mr. Holland alluded to the many losses the Mission had sustained by death in recent years, and said it was natural that their thoughts should dwell on the filling of these vacant places. He was not, however, pessimistic about it; he thought it was the duty of them all to make up their minds that the Mission and its work should not suffer, but that it should be richer for the lessons of these lives which had been passed in their midst. Turning to the financial question, Mr. Holland mentioned, in passing, that besides being the largest subscriber on the list, Mr. Rathbone had, ever since the death of Mr. Thom, kept up the latter's subscription. He felt, however, that it was most important that the number of subscribers should be increased, as it was most undesirable for the Mission to be dependent on the few. He instanced the Hurst-street Mission at Birmingham with its 1,000 subscribers, as compared with the 200 in Liverpool, and hoped to see a large increase in the number of subscribers. With regard to the proposed new building, he said that he should like to be allowed to provide the greater part, if not the whole, of the cost, an announcement which was loudly applauded.

The Rev. R. A. Armstrong, in seconding the resolution, said the time seemed favourable to retrospection, and referred to a saying of the Rev. J. H. Thom's at the age of twenty-six, that the state of a country's poor was a sure index to the morality of the rich. Speaking of Mr. Rowntree's recent book on poverty in York, he feared that, judged by Mr. Thom's standard, the rich would fall very short. He pleaded for personal effort by men of influence in such work as that being carried on at the Domestic Mission.

The Rev. W. J. Jupp, in moving a vote of sympathy with the missionaries, remarked on the depressing conditions under which their work was carried on, and carried on steadily and persistently, although knowing they were only touching the fringe of the misery and wretchedness. He expressed an earnest hope for an increase of subscribers, and that more of the business men of Liverpool would take an interest in the Mission.

Alderman Bowring, in seconding the resolution, threw out the suggestion that it would be desirable to have a lady missionary to assist the other missionaries.

The Rev. Dr. Klein, in supporting, said they only touched the fringe of any work they attempt, and must not be discouraged by that. He regretted that they could not have a great united organisation of all creeds and sects to work together in such philanthropic efforts.

The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, who was very cordially received, replied briefly on behalf of himself and Mr. Anderton, who was unfortunately not present, Mrs. Anderton being somewhat unwell.

The Rev. H. W. Hawkes moved the election of the Committee, which was seconded by Mr. Richard Robinson, who said that although removing to Manchester he still hoped to be present at as many annual meetings as possible.

Mr. Robert D. Holt supported the resolution, which was carried.

Mr. Charles W. Jones moved a hearty vote of thanks to the chairman, than whom, he said, no one had ever taken more interest in the work.

This was seconded by Mr. Fred. Bowring, and carried with acclamation.

Mr. Holland replied, and brought a most encouraging meeting to a close.

SOME WELSH CENTENARIES.

The South Wales Unitarian Association celebrated its centenary on Wednesday and Thursday at Capelgroes, having been founded in 1802, as "The Society of Believers in the Divine Unity in Wales." The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was present and took part in the proceedings. Our report of these and other meetings must be deferred until next week, but we are indebted to the Rev. R. J. Jones, of Aberdare, who unfortunately was prevented by ill-health from being present, for the following notes on the occasion:—

For many years the South Wales Association published important books and tracts, with the object of spreading the liberal faith in the principality. The chief promoters were the Rev. Thomas Morgan, Blaengorach; David Davis, Neath; Thomas Davies, Cefncoed; Thomas Evans, Aberdare; Mr. Rowlands, of the Bank at Neath; and our great hymn-writer, Edward Williams, better known as the Iolo Morganwg. Among English patrons were the Rev. Thomas Belsham and Dr. John Prior Estlin. Belsham's "Calm Inquiry" was perhaps the most important, at any rate it was the most expensive, work published by the Association; the most popular and most useful, perhaps, was that of the Rev. John James on "The Atonement."

These meetings will also celebrate the centenary of the church at Capelgroes, and will be continued on Friday at Pantdefaid to celebrate the centenary of that church — both churches having been gathered and established by Dr. Charles Lloyd (1766-1829—see "Dict. Nat. Biog.," article by A. G.) during a short stay (1799-1802) in his native country. Up to this time the Unitarianism of Cardiganshire was of the Arian type. Dr. Lloyd's views were Priestleyan or humanitarian of the most pronounced form; and he devoted himself to the spread of these views with a wonderful perseverance. In season and out of season he was possessed with the one thought—how to make these views prevail. The new views naturally caused great divisions in our older churches, but they were destined to prevail. During most of the century the two churches were under one pastorate. Dr. Lloyd returned to England and settled at Diss in Norfolk in 1803. He proved himself a very efficient schoolmaster, and while at Exeter had John Kenrick as one of his pupils. The two young churches were fortunate in securing John James, a student from the Rev. Timothy Kenrick's college, in 1803, and when he left for Glamorganshire in 1816 he was followed for a short time at Capelgroes by John Thomas; and the other ministers have been John Davies, 1818-24; Rees Davies, 1825-57; Thomas Thomas, J.P., 1857-94; Enoch Evan Jenkins, 1894-99; David Evans the present minister. At Pantdefaid the succession of ministers has been—John Thomas (at intervals) 1816-47; Owen Evans and others; Thomas Thomas, J.P., 1847-94; Thomas Arthur Thomas, the present minister. Capelgroes and Pantdefaid chapels have been recently rebuilt, and both the congregations are in a flourishing condition.

The president of the Association this year is the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., who will deliver his address on Thursday; the vice-president is the Rev. Thomas Lloyd Jones of Liverpool, and if the usual rule is followed he will become president for the coming year. Mr. Bowie's services will be utilised to the greatest possible extent; he will take part in the centenary services at Pantdefaid, and arrangements are made for him to preach three times on the Sunday following—in the evening at Lampeter, where it is expected he will get a hearty reception and a grand congregation in the largest hall available in this university town.

DENOMINATIONAL RELIGIOUS TEACHING IN ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

Sir,—At a time when the difficulties connected with religious teaching in Elementary Schools are likely to be more anxiously considered than ever, it may interest your readers to know, or be reminded of, a successful attempt to deal with them in days gone by.

About sixty years ago, Mr. Rathbone, of Green Bank, Liverpool, father of the Mr. William Rathbone lately deceased, undertook at his own expense to reorganise the then ill-staffed and almost empty Elementary Schools in Pleasant-street, Mount Pleasant, Liverpool. Other friends joined, a committee was formed, and for some time I worked regularly as a visitor, taking an active part in the teaching of the girls' department.

The religious difficulty with the large Roman Catholic population in Liverpool was at that time strongly felt, while the need for efficient secular teaching was great, and the committee were desirous to arrange a plan for religious instruction which, whilst giving no possible offence to Roman Catholics, would supply the requirements of other religious denominations in the schools. Accordingly they were opened at 9 A.M. by singing a simple morning hymn of praise, and by repeating the Lord's Prayer. The work then went on till noon, when about half-an-hour was allowed for dinner, and lessons proceeded till 3 P.M., when secular instruction ceased. The children were then classed according to the religious opinions of their parents, and ministers of each denomination, having been invited to attend, were able to give religious instruction to each class. These lessons lasted for about twenty minutes, when the schools were dismissed. The hours were suited to the district, as most of the pupils resided in the immediate neighbourhood, but would not, of course, be universally convenient.

It appears probable that Voluntary Schools, if they accept aid from the Rates, may be placed under some restrictions in regard to religious teaching, and, in that case, might be willing to adopt some such plan as the above, which actual experience has shown to be workable. I may add that had there been any objection from parents to their children attending these classes, secular instruction would have been given during the time; but no such objection was ever raised, and the schools soon became full and efficient. Why should not those who are interested in denominational teaching accept facilities of this kind if offered? There seems no reason to doubt that it would be as successful now as it has already been in times gone by.

ORGANISTS' THEOLOGY.

Sir,—I confess I am a little surprised to find one of your readers defending what I think will seem to most liberal-minded people the intolerant action of the Kirk session of the Stevenson Memorial Church in dismissing a duly appointed organist on account of his theological opinions. The question, however, is one which might be advantageously discussed in your columns. As a beginning, I would venture to suggest that both the dismissal and your correspondent's approval of it have their origin in the dogmatic spirit—the tendency to lay undue stress on theological dogmas—which, now little affecting our secular life, we had hoped was fast losing its potency even in the ecclesiastical world. Is there not, in short, on both sides an ignoring of the fact that all expression of religious emotion, in the nature of the case, partakes more or less of a dramatic and symbolic character? And of all things one would have thought that music was most free from dogmatic associations. How often, for example, have I myself (if I may be permitted to take a personal instance), though the most unmusical of mortals, felt uplifted by the grand Christmas anthem from the "Messiah"—"Unto us a child is born," &c., although it might be said of me with perfect truth that I "believe no word of it." How many verses are there in our own hymn-books which, though they may have poetic truth, will ill bear looking at in the cold light of reason; or, indeed, how few chapters in the Bible can we read without the accompaniment of a good many grains of salt! Still, I am not contending that the position of a Unitarian as organist of an orthodox church is a desirable one, and I can quite imagine that it might be made very uncomfortable. Is not that, however, a matter for the organist himself? If he is willing to supply the music, why must it be inquired to what extent he believes the words it accompanies, or what guarantee can there be that he does believe them, even though he may have been brought up in the straightest school of orthodoxy? At any rate it seems a pity, to say the least, that these good people had not inquired into the creed of the candidate, if they were to do so at all, before appointing. To cancel the appointment afterwards was certainly equivalent to a dismissal.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—A reception to the Rev. W. Jenkin Davies and Mrs. Davies was given in the Central Hall, Belfast, on Thursday, March 27, and was largely attended, a number of the ministers of the district being present. After an hour of social intercourse and tea, Mr. S. C. Davidson was called to the chair, and in a few earnest words gave a hearty and sincere welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Davies. He asked Mr. Davies to accept in the name of all the members of the congregation a roll top secretaire with a suitable inscription, but inasmuch as it was impossible to bring such a large piece of furniture into that hall, it had been sent to their residence, Clonaver. He asked Mrs. Davies to accept a small gift which the congregation wished to make to her at the same time. Mr. Jas. Davidson then presented Mrs. Davies with a handsome silver card-case. Mr. Davies, in replying, thanked all present most heartily on his own behalf and on that of his wife for the very cordial reception accorded to them. The gift of the congregation was most acceptable, and he should prize it very highly. That welcome recalled a previous meeting some six years ago when he had first come to Mountpottinger—Mr. S. C. Davidson was chairman then, as now—and he was glad that the same cordial relationship had existed amongst them through all that time. He congratulated the church on its present state of prosperity, and also the various associations affiliated thereto, which were all doing good work. It was a special gratification to him that they had included his wife in the presentation, and he thanked them for their warm welcome. Mrs. Davies added a few words for her unexpected gift and the kind greeting she had received. After some vocal and instrumental music Mr. Hanna tendered a hearty welcome on behalf of the Sunday-school. The Revs. R. J. Orr, W. Fielding, A. Ashworth, J. A. Kelly, F. Thomas, R. W. Weatherall, and G. J. Slipper, added their words of welcome, and a vote of thanks to the chairman brought the meeting to a close.

Birmingham: Old Meeting.—The Rev. Joseph Wood, owing to pressure of work and for considerations of health, has resigned his seat on the Birmingham School Board, which he has held since the resignation of the late Dr. Crosskey in 1892. The Rev. E. F. M. MacCarthy, in moving a resolution of regret and acknowledgment of Mr. Wood's services, pointed out that Mr. Wood came to the Board with all the ripe experience gained as a member of the Leicester Board. He spoke of his valued services as chairman of the Sites and Buildings Committee, a committee which made enormous demands upon a man's strength and vigour, bodily and mental. Largely, too, by his interest the musical tone of the children of the city was of a very high order. On all the committees they would feel they were losing not only a most genial man and colleague, but a very useful and serviceable helper. The Chairman (the Bishop of Coventry) seconded the resolution, and Father Glancey also associated himself with it.

Bolton: Bank-street.—The annual tea-party of the Temperance Society was held on Saturday, March 22, when about 100 persons sat down to tea. It was followed by a public meeting and concert, presided over by the President, the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. The Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Mill-street Mission, Liverpool, delivered a very impressive lantern lecture on "Child Life in Liverpool Slums." On the motion of the Rev. E. S. Hicks, M.A., seconded by Mr. J. Chadderton, a cordial vote of thanks was given to the lecturer. On the motion of Mr. G. G. Armstrong, seconded by Mr. T. Harwood, the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That this meeting cordially welcomes the Licensing Bill of the Government as a step in the right direction, and earnestly hopes that His Majesty's Ministers will press it forward till it becomes law, and that the local members of Parliament will give it their utmost support."

Byker.—The anniversary service in connection with the Unitarian Church was held on Palm Sunday, when an excellent sermon was preached by Mrs. Tweedy, from the words "The Lord hath need of them." The sermon was much appreciated by a large congregation. The annual soirée took place on Good Friday, when there was again a large attendance. After tea a meeting was held, presided over by Mr. J. Glendining. Addresses were delivered by the Chairman, Messrs. Robinson (South Shields), Tron (Heaton), Brown, Reay, Martin, Sutcliffe, and Barnfather, and a capital programme of music added to the enjoyment of a very pleasant and successful meeting.

Deal.—Of several recent successful lantern exhibitions, the latest was on "The Life of Christ and Ancient Egyptian Beliefs." Dover friends kindly lent their lantern, and the minister and a local friend furnished the slides.

Dundee.—Among the students who received degrees on the recent graduation day at St. Andrews University, were Mr. Henry Charles Williamson, B.Sc., who obtained a D.Sc., and Mr. Frank E. Williamson, an ordinary M.A. degree—sons of the Rev. H. Williamson, of Dundee.

Leicester: Free Christian Church.—After the close of the service on Sunday evening last, the congregation and choir met in the schoolroom and presented Mr. W. F. Price with a handsome silver tea and coffee service, as a slight token of their appreciation of his services, and of their high esteem and regard for him. The presentation was made on the occasion of his retirement from the position of choir-master, a position he has most capably filled during the past six years. Mr. Price is an indefatigable worker, and by no means intends to slacken his energies as regards church work, but he has found that the claims made upon his time by the duties of so many offices are more than he can reasonably continue to satisfy. Mr. Price is still superintendent of the Sunday-school and hon. secretary of the church.

Maidstone.—On the first four Sunday evenings in March a special series of discourses on "Unitarianism" was delivered, the preachers being the Revs. F. W. Stanley, W. Copeland Bowie, H. Woods Perris, and T. E. M. Edwards. Their utterances were highly appreciated. Prior to the course, nearly 4,000 addressed envelopes, each containing a tract, and a bill announcing the place, the time, and the preacher, were distributed among the townsfolk. The attendances were considerably larger than usual, and it is believed that the literature sent out will have the effect of removing much of the prevailing ignorance concerning our faith.

Manchester: Bradford.—The ladies of the Mill-street Free Church are holding a Jumble Sale on behalf of the church and school funds on Saturday, April 12. Parcels of cast-off clothing, &c., will be gratefully received, and should be sent to the Rev. W. E. Atack, care of Mr. Williams, chapel-keeper, 3, Rudkin-street, Bradford, Manchester.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—A supplementary Sale of Work of goods left over from the recent bazaar was held last week, and resulted in the adding of about £40 to the Bazaar Fund. The sale was opened by Mrs. D. A. Little, of Bowden, who delivered an interesting address. In a recent issue of The Inquirer it was announced that the recent visit of the Salvation Army to the Moss Side Church was the first instance of Salvationists and Unitarians worshipping together; but the Salvation Army visited Brook-street more than a year ago, and a report appeared in The Inquirer at the time. This year instead of the Army coming to Brook-street the visit was returned, and the Rev. C. Peach presided over a joint service in their "Temple," in which the Methodist Free Church minister and the captain also took part.

Pontypridd.—On Sunday, March 30, an interesting Flower Service was held at the Vestry Hall, in connection with the Unitarian Sunday-school. The service was well rendered under the able leadership of Mr. Howells (Alaw Cyon). The readings were given by Mr. John Lewis, who also delivered an appropriate address. Miss Clarion Hacker presided at the organ. The flowers were afterwards taken to the Workhouse.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—The 209th anniversary was celebrated by the customary tea-meeting and sacred concert on Good Friday. After tea, to which about 100 friends sat down, the chapel was crowded. Mr. T. Bond presided. An excellent programme was rendered by the choir and friends, a hearty vote of thanks being accorded to them for their services. Recently seven new members joined the congregation. The interior and exterior of the buildings have been painted and renovated.

Ravara: co. Down.—On the evening of March 26, the members and friends of the congregation, numbering over sixty, held a party in the Old Manse, when a presentation of a handsome marble clock was made to Miss Sara Huddleson, in recognition of her much-valued services in presiding so regularly at the harmonium. A short address was delivered after tea by the Rev. Richard Lyttle, who expressed the indebtedness of the congregation to Miss Huddleson. Miss Lowry, of Rockhall, made the presentation, and Miss Huddleson suitably responded, after which Miss May, on behalf of the Ravara congregation, expressed their warm appreciation of the services of members of the Moneyrea choir. A pleasant evening was spent with singing, dancing, and ping-pong. At a communion service recently, thirteen took part for the first time.

Reading (opening of New Church Hall).—The new Hall, which has just been opened, is built on the site reserved for that purpose when the church was erected some twenty-five years ago. The hall, which will hold 150, is provided with class-rooms and a separate entrance. It is built of red brick, and is lighted by three large windows. At a conversazione held in the hall on Wednesday, March 26, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter declared the building to be open; and a public meeting was afterwards held, the Mayor of Reading presiding, who expressed the pleasure he had in being present, although he was not a Unitarian. The Rev. J. E. Carpenter then gave an eloquent and suggestive address. After alluding in a happy manner to some of the maladies from which congregations sometimes suffer in their corporate capacity, he congratulated the Reading congregation on the evidence in their case of activity and vigour. As to the uses of such a building, there was first of all the Sunday-school; but there were many other uses which it should serve, such as bringing together all classes of the congregation for social and recreative purposes, and also for the discussion and consideration of many important questions. Especially was it desirable that the young people should be interested and encouraged to trust and to use their own faculties. The Rev. W. C. Bowie hoped that the hall would be a parish room in the best sense—that its influence would extend beyond those actually attending the church. Many people are under the impression that our faith may be summed up in a doctrinal formula. They must, by actual contact with us, be made to see how broad and wide and deep is the basis of our religion. The reactionary educational proposals of the Government show how much people still stand in need of enlightenment upon the most important subjects. The Rev. F. Allen and Mr. H. H. Jones also spoke, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards alluded to the fact that the absence of a settled minister, instead of depressing the congregation, had stimulated them to increased activity. The healthy state of their finances was largely due to the fact that they had so many resources in themselves, mentioning more particularly the hon. secretary. Such a result was calculated to make his ministerial brethren reflect. Mr. O. A. Shrubsole, Mr. G. R. Smith, and Mr. Councillor Hayward also spoke. The financial statement showed that the cost had been £670, towards which the congregation had contributed £318. A balance of £160 still remained to be met. During the evening special hymns were sung, and anthems and solos were given by the choir.

Saffron Walden.—On Good Friday the sixty-fifth annual tea and public meeting were held in the General Baptist Chapel, when 100 persons sat down to tea. The meeting commenced with singing and prayer, the pastor, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, being in the chair, and a varied programme of recitations, dialogues, singing, and addresses filled up the evening. The New National Song, "Good-bye to all, Good-bye"—dedicated to Mrs. McKinley and the American nation—and specially obtained from America, was rendered by Mr. Brinkworth. It is based upon "Nearer my God, to Thee." Addresses were given by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, of London, Mr. H. Hockley, deacon of the Congregational Church, and the pastor. The chapel was full, gallery included. At the recent annual financial meeting, it was found that the free-will offerings were the largest ever received. During the year upwards of £50 was expended on repairs, &c.; £25 more are needed for other necessary renovations, including a porch over the front entrance to protect from the weather.

Tavistock.—On Wednesday, March 19, a Sale of Work and Variety Entertainment, which consisted of tableaux, charades, songs, &c., took place in the Town Hall, in aid of the fund for the renovation of the Abbey Chapel. About £18 was taken, and, after expenses had been paid, there remained a balance of £15 to hand over to the treasurer. The right of the Abbey Chapel to retain the endowment of the old Dissenting Meeting House in Hatherleigh having been disputed by the Parish Council and the Baptist and Bible-Christian Ministers of Hatherleigh, the Charity Commissioners have intimated to General Jacob, Chairman of the Abbey Chapel Trustees, that they have decided the case in favour of the present holders of the endowment. "The scheme which the Commissioners will now prepare for publication in the locality, and which they propose to establish, subject to the result of such publication will, following the analogy of the Dissenters' Chapels Act, 1844, have regard to the undisputed possession for nearly 100 years of the minister of the Abbey Chapel in Tavistock, and will confirm him and his successors in the receipt of the income of the Charity."

THE LAMPETER CHURCH.

The Unitarian movement at Lampeter has but a very short history. The first Church was opened in 1876 under the present ministry. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association voted £200 towards the building, and by the liberality of friends, far and near, the task was completed. Here, however, begins the plain but sad tale. The building, though neatly furnished and imposing in appearance, owing either to a sandy foundation or structural defects, soon showed signs of dilapidation, and had at last to be abandoned. It has now been pulled down, and the services are conducted in the School-room pending the building of a new Chapel.

The congregation, with its Sunday-school, is one of the largest on the roll of our Welsh Churches, and has attained an assured and honoured position in the town. Three of its sons are in the ministry, and three more are studying at different colleges with the same object.

Lampeter, in the centre of Cardiganshire, with its great Church of England College, its Lower Hall, where the Assizes, the Quarter Sessions, the County Council Meetings, are held, is a rapidly growing town; and we feel it a duty incumbent upon us to make the new Church not only worthy of our own position, but also of the town in which it is situated. The building is estimated to cost from £1,700 to £2,000. Over £600 will be made locally. The congregation and minister, sorely grieved and crestfallen on account of the fate of their old Chapel, feel reluctant to appeal the second time to the generosity of the Unitarian public, but a re-constrained to do so in the interest of the Liberal Gospel, which they cannot at any cost renounce. This Appeal is made in confidence to old friends who helped us before, and new friends as well, all of whom cannot help being touched by the tale of sad misfortune which is the history of the first Church at Lampeter. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister, and acknowledged in the Christian Life and INQUIRER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE week has not brought us any definite news of progress towards peace in South Africa; but the feeling prevails that, however gradually, we are getting within a measurable distance of the time when reason will again assert its superiority to brute force. The relief felt at the result of the trial of Kritzinger is, no doubt, general; for, apart from considerations of humanity, it is obvious that anything that tends at all to mitigate the resentful passions so long prevalent must be to the good in the peace negotiations.

THE death of Lord Kimberley removes one who did good service for his country. Under a modest exterior his great abilities were hidden from a careless observer; but the record of his accomplished work testifies no less eloquently than the praises of his colleagues to the excellence of his character and his grip of mind. In the present state of parties his loss is not only a serious one for Liberalism, but for the cause of that tradition of geniality and mutual trust which he always maintained and sought to extend. He grew old without ceasing to love liberty, and was widely versed in men without ceasing to be kind. O si sic omnes—or even plerique!

IT is not often that the usually grave solemnity of the proceedings of the Executive Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is so pleasantly varied as on the occasion of its meeting this week. Some bird of the air having brought a whisper into the assembly, a spontaneous vote was moved in felicitous terms and carried unanimously, warmly congratulating the President and Mrs. Blake Odgers on their "silver wedding," that anniversary falling this week. It need not be added that, though taken by surprise, the learned President, in expressing his thanks and gratification, was quite equal to the occasion. With the congratulations of the Committee a host of friends will desire to associate their own.

THE first annual meeting of the Guilds' Union, which we report in another place this week, was evidently a genuine success. The mind of our churches may still need further persuasion before the movement takes hold as widely as the promoters desire and it deserves; but no one can read the remarks of the various speakers at Birmingham, remembering also who these speakers are, without realising that it is not a mere "fad," but something of very high potentiality. As we read its meaning it implies many varieties of operations, instinct with the one spirit of building up the lives of church members and young people in character and devoutness, and in ways of helpfulness for the individual, the church, and the community.

ON Tuesday the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to meet at Essex Hall, and in addition to the report of the Executive Committee the arrangements for Whit-week will be considered and the new list of officers settled for submission to the annual meeting. In the evening the London District Unitarian Society will hold its annual meeting with the President, Mr. David Martineau, in the chair. The new minister at Highgate, the Rev. R. H. Greaves, will doubtless add a welcome stimulus to the enthusiasm of the meeting by the paper which he is to read on "The Work of Our Denomination in America," from which country, as readers will remember, he has lately come. Assuredly, the Society's work was never more needed, and we hope a large meeting will support the President on this occasion.

MR. AUSTIN WEST, undeterred by the fate of the late Mr. St. George Mivart, cherishes hopes that the scientific movement within the Catholic Church will not only continue but extend until it triumphs over the champions of ignorant tradition who would bid the tide of thought roll backward. In his article on "The Abbé Loisy and the Roman Biblical Commission" in the April Contemporary, Mr. West points to several encouraging features, the most remarkable being the attitude of the Pope towards matters of Biblical criticism. The Abbé has been an assiduous writer in reviews and pamphlets, as well as a professor and lecturer on exegetical studies. He has—shall we say, of course—incurred suspicion and worse at the hands of his more orthodox brethren, although he appears to have endeavoured loyally to abide by the authoritative dicta of his superiors. It now appears that the Pope has put a stop to long-continued proceedings in which the Abbé's writings were on trial as heretical; and has instituted a "Biblical Commission" to consider the whole subject. The members belong to different countries, and most of them, like the Abbé, have been suspects before now. The special sting, however, lies in the fact that the official guardians of the faith at Rome have been passed over in making up the commission. Readers will find the article extremely instructive; and it confirms our information that a very keen interest is being exhibited just now in Catholic circles on the subject of Biblical criticism.

THE classical advice to "be 'umble" seems to be least of all necessary to the Unitarian preachers of London. A paragraph the other day in the Daily News, written in defence of London's claim to have as great representative preachers to-day as in past times, said nothing of Stopford Brooke—and, of course, all others were as dust in the balance, and less than nothing to the writer of the paragraph. We observe, however, that some one wrote to the journal named to rectify the omission of Mr. Brooke's name. We suppose it is useless to protest against the rule of the "religious editor" of the Daily News, that whereas other dissenting churches are called "Free," the Unitarians" are not granted the right of coming under that head.

THE sermon preached by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong in Cross-street Chapel, at the recent annual meeting of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches, we had hoped to publish in full in these columns, but found that it was to appear in the monthly series of Mr. Armstrong's "Sermons for the Day." It is now published, as the April number (Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street, Liverpool, 1d., by post 1½d.), with the title, "A Mighty Trust: A Challenge to Unitarian Christians," and it is a challenge not to be neglected, so that we hope the sermon will be very widely circulated among the members of our churches.

TAKING for text the words from one of Dr. Martineau's prayers, "Thou hast laid upon us a mighty trust," and passing from their special meaning in the liturgy to the more general truth that those who possess any great treasure are bound not to waste or conceal it, but to share it with others,

Mr. Armstrong appeals to his hearers, as Unitarian Christians, to realise the greatness of the treasure in their possession :—

Do you ever realise, those of you who are Unitarian Christians, that if our religion is to us anything at all, then we are not just one more among the many sects, Catholics and Protestants, Calvinists and Methodists, Baptists and Christadelphians, but a people caught up into the freedom of God. This Unitarian Christianity, so familiar in our ears and on our lips, if it is realised by our inward spirit in its real and noble beauty, is a faith such as the world has never known before, that towards which it has been groaning and travailing through many long millenniums, the consummate flower of human religion, so far as men in their present stage of evolution are able to attain. . . . I am not thinking of Unitarian Christianity as you and I express it or exhibit it in our lives;—God forbid!—but of Unitarian Christianity as it is in the inward essence of it, the truth involved in it, the life and spirit it should inspire.

Having then referred to the orthodox and semi-orthodox Churches, which, in spite of the large amount of genuine religion and true human goodness they contain, yet in their theological teaching occupy a most unstable and unreliable position, with Liberal Orthodoxy "sitting on the fence," the sermon further describes the Unitarian position :—

As for us, through no merit of our own, we possess in our midst a faith which takes all the gloom and terror out of the relation between man and God, which has no compromise to make with modern criticism and science, but rejoices in them and feeds upon them, and which can give all the inspiration, high impulse, hope and strength and purpose which any faith which men have ever held has had to give—a faith which presents a God Almighty for goodness, guiding his universe through the ages towards the perfect holiness, full of love for every soul, that looks out through human eyes upon the world, accessible to the lispings of a little child in prayer, entering into communion freely with us all whensoever our spirits seek him out, caring for our good with a tenderness of care and wisdom which no earthly mother's love approaches; a faith which presents us, in Jesus Christ, with a brother man so beautiful and pure of character, so good, so brave, so touched with human sympathy, that it is a joy and inspiration to feel we live in the same world in which he lived, aye, and bids us freely rejoice in all other Christs, Messiahs, Saviours, whom we may find among our human kind; a faith which presents us with a great brotherhood of mankind whom neither race nor clime nor creed can hold dissevered, but who all alike are the great Father's children; a faith which presents us with the glorious conviction that the Word of God is for ever a living Word, and that it speaks to-day in every earnest mind, in every quickened conscience, in every pure and sweet emotion as surely as in prophet or apostle of the olden day; since God is with us now and here and ever, nearer than the air we breathe, brighter than the light by which we see.

That is the treasure we possess—if we possess it. That is Unitarian Christianity—I know no better name for it, unless it be "the Christianity of Christ." It is the most priceless treasure that has ever shone in the soul of man. Most of us here possess it, or in part possess it. It is associated in the minds of men with these Churches of ours. It is what our preachers teach. And it is the one power to salvation for a world wavering between an orthodoxy whose intellectual defences are in ruins and a blank godlessness which must send a death-chill to the soul.

Then comes the challenge of the sermon to Unitarians. What are they doing to show the power and the beauty of this faith? We must not quote any more, but we earnestly commend the sermon to our readers, and particularly the prayer towards its close.

Brahmo Somaj School for Girls.—Mr. Ion Pritchard desires to acknowledge receipt of the following donations :—Mr. F. Nettlefold, £10; Misses M. C. and L. Sharpe, £1; Anon, £25; Mrs. H. A. Jevons, £1 1s.; Mrs. B. Bernard, £1; Mrs. J. H. Wicksteed, £1 1s.; Mrs. Spencer, 10s.; Mr. S. Martineau, 10s. 6d.; Miss Coulter, 5s.; Mr. Fowler, 5s.; Mr. D. Martineau, £1; Mr. E. Linton, 10s.; Mr. Midlane, 5s.; Mr. Keating, £1; Mrs. Keating, £1; Mr. J. Harrison, £1 1s.; already acknowledged £21; total, £66 8s. 6d. Further donations should be sent to Mr. Pritchard, at Essex Hall, not later than May 1, when it is proposed to remit to Calcutta the amount collected.

A QUESTION OF RELIGIOUS ART.

Nonconformity, as compared with Roman Catholicism, is always being belittled in the matter of art. The Roman Church has ever been the supporter of the Fine Arts, from her has come their inspiration—so we are again and again assured. And the statement rarely meets with an answer, and yet that statement is not half so true as appears on the face of it. In the first place anything like unquestioning devotion does not tend to encourage the sense of the beautiful; for if an object is worshipped in virtue of something ascribed to it, its real character will not be examined. The gods we can view at the British Museum are not particularly lovely, and yet they have all been objects of passionate veneration. The crudeness of those Egyptian figures, half animal, half human, is evident; it is less palpable when harmonised under some general idea, and this means that some rationalising process is going on. The Greeks were the first people who blended the human and animal into forms of majestic beauty, and they did so by a thoroughly conscious method of selection; the leonine front of Zeus is the expression of their ideal of lofty character, and belongs to the age when the gods were identified with ideas, and no longer worshipped in fear. Such a state of opinion seems to be congenial to art, which must be preserved from inanity by an abundance of ideas behind it, and unless a critical spirit be encouraged ideas will be lacking. There is no age in history so barren of large and critical ideas as that which immediately preceded the revival of art and literature in Europe, and that wonderful flood which swept on a sudden everywhere came not from ecclesiastical Rome, but from Pagan Greece—came from the investigation, by people weary of bondage, of the memorials of a country where intellect and imagination were the more reverenced the more independent they were. Rome was powerful enough at first to dominate the movement, and in pictures everywhere we detect her as a drawback: the monastic ideal emaciates the body, limiting that glorious freedom which Greece would impart; the blind devotional instinct gives that inane smile, and checks the treatment of the head on intellectual lines. If the figures are naked they are somewhat ashamed, like those pious ascetics who were wont to undress in the dark.

As the movement grew, the tendency towards the beautiful took men further and further from Rome; and in some schools the protest against the ascetic ended in a violent reaction, wherein art is unblushingly sensual, the influence of the Church being confined to titles—for the picture is called "A Virgin," but its subject is a courtezan. But this reaction was arrested in other schools, and here we find the two ideas blended into subtle and beautiful art, the devotional and æsthetic in harmony. And my point now is that this is not so much the spirit of the Church as the spirit of those who were striving to reform her. Of these Savonarola stands first. Reactionist as he was, like all reactionists, like More or Rousseau, he was full of fresh progressive ideas; for, as it always is with the reactionist, the bygone age of purity and simplicity to which he harks back was largely the dream of his own fervid imagination. The religion of Savonarola, democratic and evangelical, burning with emotion for the poor, bursting into thunder against tyranny and extravagance, and rising into poetry in perception of the beautiful, and into prophecy in insight into the tendencies of his age, was not the religion of Rome; and the artists he inspired, such as Perugino, take us back in emotion and feeling to a Christianity that is, except in form, pre-ecclesiastical. They do not paint dogmas, and the question whether the Virgin was conceived in sin or not does not constrain them to give her face an expression bordering on idiocy. The subtle human emotions of the Greek artists are here, but subdued into a religiousness which the Gospels and the old sacred legends, not official Rome, have inspired.

And there is just one more point which seems to me important in this great and interesting question. Beard, in his brilliant lectures on the Reformation, says that the Revival was rather imitative in Italy, but creative in France, Germany, and England. This seems true largely. For whereas the Italians confined themselves to imitations of moods and styles and forms, the more northerly nations took the movement, so to speak, into their own temper and character. With their gravity and seriousness as a background, it came out in their method of reading the Bible, it touched them to finer moral and spiritual issues, and in some cases to particularly fine artistic issues. But Beard's generalisation, of course, does not completely cover the field. There were deep serious natures in Italy, and they expressed themselves for the most part in art. And there are pictures claimed for Catholicism which belong to the Reformation properly. For instance, the Last Supper of Leonardo da Vinci is not catholic, it is scriptural. Its austerity, its gospel reticence, its conception of the tragedy as lying in the fact that one of you shall betray me, not in some coarse scenic effect, its masterly characterisation, all this is the revival of old Greek methods of criticism as applied to the gospel narratives, and may be compared to such work as Erasmus did. And such methods, once and for all, do not make for the ideal of religion as formulated by Rome.

R. H. U. Bloor.

LITERATURE.

A HISTORIC VIEW OF THE NEW TESTAMEN *

This book is composed of the Jowett Lectures, delivered by Dr. Gardner at the Passmore Edwards Settlement in 1901. For those who have read Dr. Gardner's larger work, "Exploratio Evangelica," there is not much that is new in this second book. Nevertheless, it is likely to be much more effective because it is simpler and in smaller compass. It will probably penetrate into many homes where books written by professed members of our churches would be shunned. It will popularise the results of recent Biblical criticism, and will leaven the minds of many who have hitherto treated the Bible as a book apart. Dr. Gardner's knowledge and ability as an archæologist, the clearness of his style, the breadth of his view, and the strength of his convictions all tend to make this book an important contribution to the history of the New Testament. But this book deserves more than vague commendation or a general description. It is a book which challenges thought. It provokes a reviewer not simply to catalogue its contents, and to write about its general results, but to ask, How does it affect myself, what good is there in it for me? I venture to think that there is more interest and use in a reviewer describing the effect of a book upon himself as an ordinary intelligent man, than in his describing what he imagines may be its effect upon other people.

There is something rather pathetic about this book. It impresses and instructs in the parts about which Dr. Gardner appears to care least; it fails to convey clear ideas or to carry conviction in the parts about which Dr. Gardner cares most. The critical part of the book is to my mind the successful part. Dr. Gardner deals most ably with the principles of historic criticism, and with the idea of revelation. On the basis of these principles he then proceeds to discuss the life of Jesus, the authenticity of the Gospels, the question of miracles, the life of St. Paul, and other New Testament problems. All this is done in a very interesting and suggestive way, and it is done with unswerving faithfulness to the spirit of the historian as described in a quotation from Freeman:—

> No spirit can be more directly opposed to any method of sound historical study than one which puts any writer, however illustrious, beyond the reach of that process of comparison and criticism which is the very life of all historical research.

But this is not the part of the book on which Dr. Gardner lays most stress; it is the larger part, it is the most effective part, but interwoven with all this there is a constructive attempt, which can, perhaps, best be expressed in Dr. Gardner's own words: "We want to substitute psychology for metaphysics, history for rationalism, and experience for authority." In some way the book seems to aim at providing us with a religion and with doctrines for modern life which will not be shaken by any historic criticism, however thorough.

That is one of the greatest aims which any writer can set before himself, but for my own part I certainly do not feel that I receive either religion or doctrine from Dr. Gardner's book. Wise criticisms, suggestive ideas are given to us, but a clear distinction between the permanent and the transitory in Christianity, or between what is true and false in creeds and doctrines, this is not given. There would be no reason to complain, except for the fact that Dr. Gardner seems to think that he has given it to us, and that by the psychologic method he has the key to all the mythologies and can find the essence of everything. Dr. Gardner contends, no doubt with much truth, that it was the spiritual needs of the early Christians which created the Gospel legends and which later created the creeds and the ceremonies and the sacraments. "What we have to investigate," he says, "is the way in which the Christian ideas found an embodiment—in the past in the history of the Founder, in the future in prophecy of the end of the world, in the present in doctrinal schemes." Elsewhere he says: "The views which I shall try to establish are two:—(1) That alike the historic and doctrinal statements of the New Testament are based mainly on Christian experience; and (2) That in the formulation of this experience there is always an element of false theory." He quotes Bishop Westcott to the effect that "The Gospels were the result, not the foundation, of the apostolic teaching," i.e., they are the product of three things—actual events, apostolic experience evoked by those facts, and apostolic theory.

All this is very suggestive, but we must confess to being irritated continually with the question, What truth is there in this experience, this psychology, this Christian consciousness of which we hear so much? Dr. Gardner boasts that he is substituting psychology for metaphysics. Metaphysics without psychology is likely to take the form of wild speculation or of scholastic discussion based upon unreal authority; but a psychology of the deeper elements of our nature which does not end in metaphysics is surely profoundly unsatisfactory. The result upon our mind of Dr. Gardner's arguments is that we see to some extent how Christian doctrines and ceremonies and the Gospel stories arose out of emotion, experience and longings, but we do not see in the least what element of reality there is which corresponds to those feelings, or even whether there is any reality at all. We are left with a number of mental facts which explain the origin of doctrines; as a historian Dr. Gardner need go no further. But from a positive teacher, from a reconstructor, from one who would give us a purer religion—and Dr. Gardner seems to aim at this—we have to ask what truth is there in these mental facts, what do they tell us of the real nature of God and man?

A very interesting book has been published lately, written by Mr. Fielding, called "The Hearts of Men." It is a naif, simple and daring antobiography of a man seeking for religious truth. He tells us how he was brought up in a narrow orthodoxy both of faith and conduct, and how through contact with scientific teaching and the moral standards of the world, he lost all confidence in the beliefs and in the ethics of Christianity. He spent many years of his life among the Burmese Buddhists; he lived for the most part alone with nature and with himself. He tried in vain to find help from the thoughts and theories of authoritative teachers in various religions. At last he turned from intellectual systems to the hearts of men. "Man and his necessities," he says, "are the eternal truth, and all his religions are framed by himself to minister to his own needs." Here we have, in plain outspoken words, a theory which seems to us implicit in Dr. Gardner's book. "Doctrine," says Dr. Gardner, "cannot hope to comprise eternal truth in human words, but it can summarise in intelligible speech the experiences of the religious life." No doctrine, of course, can comprise all or nearly all of eternal truth; at the most it can only give a fragment, and can only give it very imperfectly. But to be a doctrine it must be more than a summary of religious experience; it must not be content with describing and classifying the higher feelings, and leaving it an absolutely open question whether there is any reality corresponding to them.

It is a vitally important change of method which Dr. Gardner and Mr. Fielding adopt when they turn from churches and creeds and theories to the hearts of men. It is the experiences of men and women through love and suffering and self-control, which reveal God and which bring us into contact with the deepest realities. But they give us the impression—perhaps in Dr. Gardner's case a wrong impression—that they are satisfied with the experiences, and that they do not know or consider it possible to know whether those experiences correspond to any reality.

To say as Mr. Fielding says, that religion is framed by man to meet his own needs, that it is all a matter of feeling and will, is to leave the question of reality not merely open but doubtful. Religion must be more than an instinctive emotional protection if it is to remain religion for us. It cannot be rightly described as "framed by man to meet his own needs." It is God of whom religion speaks, and it is God through whom religion comes.

No doubt it is a difficult task to interpret experience, to decide between reality and appearance, to arrive at a theology out of a psychology. It is, indeed, the greatest of all tasks, and we have no right to expect it from an historian and critic like Dr. Gardner.

Our complaint, so far as we have one, is that he seems to make Christianity almost independent of the reality of God. It is a product of the consciousness, the needs and the will of Jesus and the early Christians, and would have been the same whether God exists or not.

But the book is so good, and so interesting from the historical point of view, that it is almost ungrateful to refer to anything else. We hope that it will be read very widely, and we are sure that it will give every careful reader new light upon the growth of Christian history and doctrine.

LABOUR MOVEMENTS.*

Mr. Howell has published his work at a time when there is considerable interest in the fate of trade unions owing to the decision of the House of Lords that they are liable to be sued for damages for the acts of their officials. We could wish that he had dealt with this latest aspect of the labour question; but he has, at any rate, given us an admirable account of the various stages through which the Unions have reached the status and responsibilities they now enjoy. He tells fully the story of the six Dorchester labourers. In 1832 there was a general advance in wages, and the agricultural labourers at Tolpuddle, near Dorchester, met their employers to negotiate for a rise, and were promised the same wages—10s. a week—as were paid by other farmers in the neighbourhood. This promise was not kept, and the following year their wages were lowered from 9s. to 8s. The men then appealed to the magistrates, and appeared before them in the County Hall, but were told that the magistrates had no power to fix wages. Soon afterwards their wages were again reduced, to 7s., and they were told that a further reduction to 6s. would follow. After this two delegates of a trade union visited the village, and a union was formed there, its members, like the members of friendly societies, Freemasons, and Orangemen, taking an oath to abide by the rules, not to divulge the business, and to be faithful to one another. The next year a proclamation was issued by the magistrates threatening with seven years' transportation any men who joined this union. This proclamation appears to have been distinctly illegal, as the Combination Laws under which the threat was made had been repealed eight years previously. But on Feb. 24th, 1834, George Loveless, who wrote a full account of the whole story in 1837, was arrested with five others, lodged in Dorchester Jail, and promptly committed for trial. When the trial came off, March 15th, there was the utmost difficulty to secure evidence of any crime. The men admitted taking an oath, but it was an innocent, lawful oath; they were Methodists, but, however offensive that was, it was no crime, and the general conduct of the men was admitted to be thoroughly good.

* "Labour Legislation, Labour Movements, and Labour Leaders." By George Howell, F.S.S. (London: Fisher Unwin. 1902. Price 10s. 6d. net.)

At last an Act was routed out, passed in 1796–7, after the Mutiny of the Nore, for the suppression of mutiny among sailors and marines. Under the provisions of this Act these agricultural labourers were convicted. The judge deferred sentence for two days, and then told them "that not for anything they had done, or intended to do, but as an example to others, he considered it his duty to pass the sentence of seven years transportation upon each of the prisoners." This monstrous sentence was carried into effect, and, with iron fetters riveted on their legs, the men were sent to penal settlements in Australia Of course, the country was stirred with a storm of indignation, and the Government was besieged with appeals to grant a pardon. At first, Lord Melbourne, the Whig Prime Minister, was obdurate, and Lord Brougham supported him in his refusal. The Times expressed delight when the sentence was passed, because "of the criminal and fearful spirit of combination which had seized like a pestilence on the working classes of this country." But the agitation grew. A memorial signed by 240,000 persons was presented to Lord Melbourne, and a meeting was held in London attended by 400,000 people. At length Lord John Russell was authorised to state that the Dorchester Unionists were not only to be set at liberty, but to be sent back to England free of expense, and "with every necessary comfort." But even this tardy reparation was not carried out as promised. It was deemed inexpedient that the men should return in triumph, and so every possible delay and petty meanness were interposed with the object of keeping the men out in the colony or shipping them off to Canada. One, however, returned and told the story. And all this happened just after the Reform Act of 1832. No wonder there was agitation for the People's Charter.

Strikes and lock-outs were common in the fifties, and some of our readers will be interested in the account of the weavers' strike at Padiham in 1859. The narrative helps us to realise the enormous advantage which the cotton trade now derives from being so well organised. In no trade is unionism more powerful, or do labour disputes more rarely lead to strikes.

Considerable attention is paid to the events at Sheffield during the sixties, and to the Royal Commission which resulted in the Trade Union Act. Since then the record is of more peaceful progress, though there have been some stormy scenes. Among the subjects dealt with are the prosecution of the London gas stokers, the Agricultural Labourers' Union, the Plimsoll agitation, the Federation of Employers, and the dock labourers' movement. These and many other topics are treated in a calm, historical spirit, without heat or bitterness, and Mr. Howell may be warmly thanked for an important contribution to the social history of England during the nineteenth century.

OBITUARY.

MRS. SCRIVENER.

Our religious community has lost through the death of Mrs. Scrivener, which took place at her residence, Hilldrop-road, N., on Saturday, April 5, a deeply interested, generous and true friend. Since the erection of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, N.W., nearly 50 years ago, she, with her husband, the late Mr. William Scrivener, who died three years ago, entered heartily into all the interests and prospects of the church, and until quite recently, rarely missed the Sunday morning service. Seldom, indeed, has there been a sweeter, more faithful or more consecrated life; or one more loving and beloved. Beneath the gentlest presence, there lay an intelligent firmness, a disciplined will, and a sympathy touched to everything good and true. She loved her home, and found in it the very centre of her life, which was made sacred by the purest domestic ties, and enriched by the sweetness and warmth of human love. Very calm and peaceful was her day's decline, and her life was a benediction to the end. After a short illness, in her 77th year, she passed away, in a peacefulness, like a quiet sleep, to reap the rich fruits of the immortal life. She leaves a son and two daughters to mourn their irreparable loss. The funeral, which took place on Wednesday at Highgate Cemetery, was conducted by her friend and former minister, Rev. Alexander Farquharson.

"THE LORD'S PRAYER" AND THE PRAYER OF JESUS.

"Lord, teach us to pray."—Luke xi. 1.

In the Gospel of Luke where the above words occur the answer put into the mouth of Jesus is prompt and definite enough: "When ye pray, say –" And then follows a form strikingly different in several respects from the better-known version in Matthew: "Father, Hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come. Give us day by day our daily bread. And forgive us our sins; for we ourselves also forgive everyone that is indebted to us. And bring us not into temptation."*

This divergence alone might suggest the question, which was the original form? but the concluding words of the disciple's request ought, I think, to move us even more to a searching inquiry as to the authenticity of this formulated prayer attributed in its two versions to Jesus. For the disciple asks "Teach us to pray—even as John also taught his disciples." Now this was an appeal which would have far less weight with Jesus than with his disciples after his death. When the example of John was cited as a reason for his disciples to fast, he utterly repudiates the idea that new movements are to follow the pattern of old ones.† But to the disciples after they had lost the inspiration of his living voice, it may have seemed almost a necessity to put themselves on a level with the disciples of John in this respect, by having a form of prayer from their Master's own lips. In short, there seems reason for saying that, had there been no authentic "Lord's Prayer," then, sooner or later, it would have become necessary (as Voltaire might have said) to compile one.

Possibly the discussion of this subject to its ultimate conclusion might be regarded as profitless if it was not involved in the great question of what prayer was to Jesus himself, supremely influencing, as it undoubtedly did, his whole life and teaching. In fact the question is vital because we still need to go to this God-filled man and say: "Lord, teach us to pray."

The Gospels often tell us of Jesus praying by himself alone on the mountains or in desert places, and it is this secret prayer which seems most characteristic of him; so that even the few occasions when he is said to have prayed aloud and his actual words are recorded, fail, with one exception, to impress us as deeply as his habit of constant communion with God alone. And the question naturally arises whether such a man as Jesus was likely to give his disciples any set form of words in which to pray, or was not rather likely to endeavour to instil into them the spirit of prayer which no form of words can finally express. And if he told his disciples not to think beforehand of any set words when they came before the judgment seat, but to rely upon the words the Spirit should give them at the time, how much more should we expect him to counsel his disciples to rely upon the Holy Spirit within for words with which to approach the seat of God. Moreover his recorded injunctions as to prayer, excepting this in St. Luke, are, as a rule, of a general character, "Whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe it is granted and ye shall have it," and so forth. We are, therefore, far more inclined to the introduction to the prayer in Matthew, "After this manner pray ye," which does not commit the disciple to the exact form following, and might have been intended merely as an indication of the general nature of the thoughts and feelings which should fill our minds in prayer.

* Text of Revised Version.

But unfortunately the objections to accepting the Matthew version of the prayer as the original are even more serious, at all events at first sight, than those against the simpler version. For, in the first place, it is difficult to believe that anyone would alter the fuller prayer to the shorter form, whereas it is easy to understand the motive for amplifying the somewhat barer form of Luke.

And this argument is strengthened by a somewhat closer examination of the differences between the two. For in Matthew's version we find the petitions are increased to the mystic number seven, a number which had some special virtue in Jewish belief and is highly characteristic of this most Jewish of the Gospels. It is, then, easy to understand why we should find in a Gospel for Jewish Christians a prayer of originally five petitions increased to seven; but it is much harder to understand why the writer of the third Gospel should deliberately cut down a prayer of seven petitions to five. And the difficulty is increased when we examine the petitions in question, for Matthew's two additions (if we may call them so), though scarcely more than amplifications of the petitions immediately preceding them, are nevertheless very beautiful, and one of them is adapted from an unquestionable utterance of Jesus himself; so that it is difficult to understand Luke's selection. In the first instance, of the two phrases "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven," can we easily explain why Luke should select only the former? Whereas it is easy to understand why Matthew should add the latter, recalling as it does the last supreme and awful prayer of the Master in Gethsemane. Equally difficult, if not more so, is it to understand the selection from the two petitions "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," of the former; whereas the addition of the latter, somewhat softening the "Bring us not into temptation," is intelligible enough.

But a stronger argument against accepting the Matthew version as the authentic one lies in the fact that it seems to break the flow of the discourse in which it is embedded, and even to be conspicuously out of place. In Luke it comes very naturally as an answer to the disciple's "Teach us to pray." But in Matthew it comes in the midst of a discourse against "vain repetitions" and prayer in public. "Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret, and thy Father which seeth in secret shall recompense thee." And again, "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask." This is a deeply spiritual discourse on inward communion between God and man which appears in strange juxtaposition with any set form of prayer however simple and beautiful. Nor can we plead that the fact of its being a "form" is unessential, and that it is only intended as a general guide to prayer, for the balance and symmetry of the form are carefully worked out and perfected to a degree that would be unnecessary and even dangerous in an utterance intended as a purely general and spiritual guide. Not only have we the seven petitions with their introductory invocation, but we find these evenly distributed between man and God. As the Ten Commandments refer in the first half to our duty towards God, and in the second half to our duty towards man, so this prayer begins with three petitions and its invocatory introduction (making four phrases) referring to God:

Our Father, which art in heaven,
(1) Hallowed be Thy name,
(2) Thy kingdom come,
(3) Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven;

while the last four refer to man:

(4) Give us this day our daily bread,
(5) Forgive us our debts, as we also have forgiven our debtors,
(6) Lead us not into temptation,
(7) Deliver us from evil.

It might even be possible to trace some correspondence between the two sets of phrases—the first of the divine phrases referring to God's holy and heavenly nature, while the first of the human phrases refers to our utter dependence upon earthly needs. The phrase, "Thy kingdom come," may possibly be paralleled by the petition regarding forgiveness, for surely when man is forgiven by man and at one with God, the kingdom of heaven will not be far distant.*

And, lastly, the petition that God's will be done on earth as in heaven bears very directly upon the weakness of the human will, that seeks in the last phrases to be strengthened against temptation and evil. But it is unnecessary to press this argument, for symmetry and system are clearly enough present even if this is unconfirmed. Moreover, to establish the fact that this prayer is deliberately and purposely a "form" is not to prove incontestably that it is out of place in this discourse on secret prayer, though surely it ought to make us pause. A more striking if not really weightier argument seems to lie in the abruptness of the passage following the prayer. For after the last phrases, "Bring us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," the next sentence continues without connection, "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive you your trespasses." Now I do not say that it would be impossible or altogether uncharacteristic of New Testament style to neglect the intervening words and refer back without explanation to the earlier phrase, although it is certainly remarkable that a different word, "trespass," should be used in the comment, from the one used in the prayer, "debt." But surely it is at all events a plausible suggestion that the original passage may have been the parallel of Mark xi. 25 (the nearest approach in the second Gospel to our Lord's Prayer), where Jesus says, "When ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any one, that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses."

Such a passage as this might easily be restored in the text instead of the formal prayer, and would be conspicuously more in harmony with the general tone of the discourse. The passage would then run somewhat as below. After speaking of doing alms in secret it continues: "And when ye pray ye shall not be as the hypocrites, for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and in the streets . . . . But thou when thou prayest enter into thine inner chamber. . . . And in praying use not vain repetitions as the Gentiles do . . . . Be ye not therefore like unto them, for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him. But whensoever ye stand praying, forgive, if ye have ought against any one, that your Father also which is in heaven may forgive you your trespasses. For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses."

And now turning at last from the purely critical to the more psychological and spiritual question, do we not find the suggested solution in this passage from Mark? That Jesus gave his disciples injunctions regarding prayer is beyond dispute, but is it not possible to discern a spiritual chasm between the injunction, "When ye pray say 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive those indebted to us,' and the spiritual command, "When ye stand praying, forgive?" The former is, as we all know too well, liable to become nothing better than words upon the lips, but there is no escaping the latter. We may easily obey the former and say all that we ought to feel, but we have not obeyed the latter until we have actually achieved a psychological victory and done the thing we ought.

And so I believe we shall find that all Jesus's authentic injunctions to prayer are of this class. To Jesus prayer may be the asking for blessings spiritual and even material. "Whatsoever things ye pray and ask for," he says, but it is always in its essence the realising of a living active relation between God and man. There is no such thing to Jesus as prayer without spiritual effort and regeneration. God does His part only in response to the action of the spirit of man, for the relation between the human and divine will is no casual one, but veritably essential. In fact Jesus's conception of prayer, while rising immeasurably above the heathen materialism of the Mosaic ritual, inherits something from its robust concreteness, and to Jesus no more than to Abraham is the conception possible, of prayer divorced from its accompanying sacrifice. "Whatsoever ye pray and ask for, believe," he says. We on our part must do the spiritual deed, or our prayer is wingless and soul-less. "When ye stand praying, forgive," for "with what measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again." And so in the darkness of Gethsemane his own truest conception of prayer finally wins the victory. We first hear him asking God to take away the "cup of staggering," as Isaiah had called it. He still believes in man's right to ask for salvation in this world; and, perhaps, half doubting his own faith, he passionately clings to the knowledge of God's omnipotence. "If it be possible," and then "all things are possible to thee." But at last his own supreme greatness triumphs, and in his last words we read the negation of all prayer for gifts from the "Father who knoweth what things we have need of before we ask."

* As Blake has it, in his couplet: —
"Mutual forgiveness of each vice,
Such are the gates of Paradise."

Now he is no longer asking, but giving. The crisis of his being is reached as his soul does the supreme deed, renders the final sacrifice with the words, "Howbeit, not what I will but what thou wilt."

Now if this is the final surrender of man's right to make demands of God it is the foundation of his power to reach God in perfect communion. And, accordingly, he now turns to his disciples, and in his last teaching says, "Watch and pray," not, as our "Lord's Prayer" puts it, that God lead us not into temptation, but "pray, lest ye enter into temptation; the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." And so once more and finally we have his testimony to the fact that prayer is the deed which unites us to God. He does not say we are to pray that we shall not be led to do wrong, but the prayer itself is our safeguard against wrong. Watch and commune with God, we might render his words, and then no evil hath power to approach you.

Finally, then, to summarise the question: We have the Lord's Prayer introduced in St. Luke by words which suggest that it may possibly have been compiled in response to a later demand. In St. Matthew we find the prayer in a fuller, more perfect, and symmetrical form, but ill-suited to the tenor of the discourse in which it lies embedded. And, lastly, we find in St. Mark, where the prayer does not occur, at least three of its most important phrases in what appears to be their original and authentic context. If we ask ourselves how these utterances could be modified to take their place in a set prayer it is difficult, or impossible, to imagine how this could have been done more beautifully than in our "Lord's Prayer," and yet it is surely even more impossible to question that their full power and beauty is only revealed when we turn to the scattered passages where the Divine pressure of present events and emotions was actively moulding and kindling the human genius that uttered them. Out of the awful fire of the soul's experience were struck these three great thoughts:—

> "Forgive when ye pray,—for this alone is to be forgiven of your Father in heaven."
> "Let your willing spirits ceaselessly commune with God, lest the weak flesh fall."
> "Father, thy will, not mine, be done."

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

The first annual meeting of this Union was held on Easter Tuesday, April 1st, at the Old Meeting Church, Birmingham. In the afternoon a business meeting was held under the presidentship of the Rev. Joseph Wood, and a conference followed. There was a large attendance, including the following:—Revs. C. Hargrove, J. Ellis, J. Birks, H. Gow, J. Wrigley, E. D. P. Evans, A. A. Charlesworth, E. A. Voysey, A. Ryland, C. D. Badland, Wilfrid Harris, Messrs. C. Harding, J. H. Forrester, E. L. Tyndall, C. Wood, E. M. Laye, A. Wigley, Miss Edith Gittins, Miss C. Badland.

The Rev. J. Ellis (Secretary) read the report as follows:—

The first Annual Report of the National Conference Guilds Union must of necessity be a record of beginnings; but beginnings, as the Council believe, fraught with great possibilities. It owes its origin to a paper read at the Leicester Conference, 1900, by the Rev. John Ellis, and a brief discussion thereupon. The writer, pleading for a more consecrated interest in the religious life of the young on the part of those who professed to have their welfare at heart, advocated the organisation, in our churches, of societies which should bring the young people into real religious fellowship and provide an opportunity for self-expression and mutual encouragement in the best things. He indicated that there were already in the churches forming the Conference several societies with just such aims, that had been doing excellent work for and through the young during many years. He therefore advocated that the first step should be to bring these scattered societies into union for the more effective spread of the Guild Idea. The whole matter was referred to the Conference Committee for consideration. At their first meeting subsequent to the Leicester Conference, they appointed a Sub-Committee, consisting of those who had shown special interest in young people, and who had experience of Guilds and Young People's Religious Societies, with power to act.

This Sub-Committee at once set to work to draft a constitution for a proposed Union of Guilds and Young People's Societies. Their aim was, on a distinctly religious basis, to include in happy fellowship the various types of societies which had grown up naturally out of local needs. The draft constitution, circulars and leaflets were issued to the churches; with the result that a decided impetus was given to the Guild movement in the churches which form the Conference.

The inaugural meeting of the Guilds' Union was held at Little Portland-street Chapel, London, on Thursday, May 30, last year. Considering the great pressure of meetings at that time, the gathering was influential and representative. The draft constitution was adopted with but slight modification. Officers and council were elected. Encouraging addresses were given by the Revs. Dr. Crothers, C. W. Wendte, J. Wood, C. Hargrove, H. Gow, J. J. Wright and others; and the Union started its career with confidence and hopefulness.

The Council are gratified with results thus far achieved. A reference to the "Year Book" will show that already twenty-three Guilds have joined the Union with a total membership of 1,297. Since the "Year Book" was issued two of the non-affiliated Guilds have come in—namely, Bradford and Lye, bringing the membership up to 1,439.

There are in addition fourteen Guilds which have sent reports, with a membership of 504. We have also heard of Guilds having been recently started at Stockton, Pendleton, and Holbeck. These results, attained in less than twelve months, or within two years, if we go back to the Leicester Conference, are distinctly encouraging.

The "Manual of Services and Prayers for Guild Missions," issued by the Council last autumn, is now used in several places, and the responsive utterances as well as the simple fervent prayers are found to be greatly helpful to the religious life.

The "Year Book," published early in January, 1902, is having a good sale. It should be useful in giving information to those who want to know about the Guild Movement, and its suggestiveness as to topics and methods of Guild members.

The Daily Devotional Readings at the end are calculated to send those who use them into the work and experience of the day with brighter thought and nobler aim.

The problem which the Union has now to face is, How to make the Union really effective. Guilds men and women in our churches will be strengthened in their goodwill and purpose when they realise that they are really parts of a greater body. Therefore some method must be devised by which the various Guilds may know of each other's doings. The weekly or monthly periodicals should be used for the propagation of Guild intelligence. Then as autumn approaches there should be an earnest combined effort to bring home to all concerned the vital importance to our churches of the Guild Idea. May we not hope the time is nigh at hand when the consecrated young life in our churches will assert its power, and become an influence in the community making for religious, intellectual and social advance?

The Treasurer's report not being ready, the Secretary notified that the liabilities amounted to about £39 and receipts to about £20, leaving a deficit of about £19. Much of the expense this year had been initial outlay, and need not occur again.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, congratulated the Union on its satisfactory beginning, and emphasised both the need and possibilities of such work as it could do among our churches.

The Rev. C. Hargrove, in seconding the motion, referred specially to the work of the Secretary, who had suggested the Union, and by energetic work had done a great part in promoting its success thus far. He wished Mr. Ellis, in taking up arduous duties in London, to feel encouraged by their appreciation of his labours for the Union, and of his efficient ministry in the North. He also expressed much satisfaction with the work already accomplished by the Guilds' Union, and indicated lines on which its influence might extend.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

The officers and members of Council were then elected for the ensuing year, the following names being proposed by the Rev. J. Wood, and seconded by Mr. J. H. Forrester: — President, Rev. Joseph Wood; Vice-President, Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A.; Secretary, the Rev. John Ellis; Treasurer, H. P. Greg, Esq.; Council:—Revs. W. H. Drummond, B.A., E. D. P. Evans, J. J. Wright, F. Freeston, Miss Edith Gittins, Miss Florence Hill, Miss Tremain, Mr. C. Wood, leaving four others to be be co-opted.

At a subsequent meeting the President delivered an address on "The Guild Idea," tracing its origin through the Frith Guilds and Peace Guilds of the seventh century, the Religious Guilds of a later time and the modern Guild movement in the Churches. The ancient Guilds contained much that was noble and beautiful, and existed largely for the protection of the rights and liberties of the people.

The essential thing in all Guilds, ancient or modern, is that they are Associations for mutual help, mutual enjoyment, and mutual encouragement in good endeavour. Amongst many valuable suggestions Mr. Wood advocated—(1) the formation of District Unions of Guilds; (2) the undertaking of some united effort, such as a Country Holiday Home, to which all Guilds might recommend those needing rest and health; (3) the promotion of religious culture by means of essays on subjects selected by the Council. These would be in accord with the great aims of the Guild, which are to quicken a sense of responsibility for personal character and to quicken a sense of responsibility for the public good.

Miss Edith Gittins (Leicester) read a paper, of which the following is an epitome:—

We regard with too little anxiety the disuse of pious practices which nourished the religious life of our Puritan forerunners. Honour and reverence to their memory! God make us as faithful to our light as they were to theirs! We live in a new earth, under new heavens. Everything is more wonderful than was supposed. It seems truer to say that miracles are always happening than to say that "miracles do not happen"—all days, all times, all places are irradiated by the Divine Presence. The Word of God is not between Bible covers only. The old conception of the Eternal as outside the world is fast fading, and we know Him as the uplifting life of all things. We therefore need no Mediator to find Him or to be found of Him. The Message of Jesus is better understood than it can ever have been before. What joy and peace should be ours, how zealously we should spread abroad our Gospel, how earnestly teach it. Yet how miserly are we with immortal things, how superficial, how dumb; our silence is in large part due to shame, we realise so poorly the splendour of our calling. Yet this does not excuse the withholding of our testimony. If we do not remind one another of the Ideal Good, the light of it is apt to fade; we lose the vision. If we do not share the treasure we become ever poorer. Speech about the real things of life binds us to goodness. Preachers, teachers, and learners should find goodness more possible because of their known attitude and profession. Let us carefully separate, and retain and use, the things that remain true for us from those that are outgrown by reason of our larger knowledge, and welcome every means by which the spiritual life may be strengthened.

Mr. A. Terry (Leeds) spoke on Guilds from a layman's standpoint. He likened the Guild in the moral and religious sphere to the technical school in the intellectual. They should aim to attract the young people at the critical age when it became a question whether they would remain with us or be swept off into the current of the world and drift away until they were lost to us forever. They wanted to show the young that what they had been taught was no abstract theory based upon hypotheses of doubtful origin, but something which was really practical, and from which practical results might be obtained, whether the experiment made were of the small ones of the laboratory or technical school, or of world-wide dimensions; to show them and place in their hands the power of proving for themselves, with the least possible supervision, the fact that good works might be done in a small way as well as in a large one, and that the power of doing them was not restricted to the elders. The Guild fostered in the young a love of being of service to their fellow men.

Miss C. Badland (Kidderminster) took as her subject "Brotherhood: or Following Jesus." Jesus preached the good news of the Fatherhood of God and people believed him, and the reason why they believed him was that he showed himself the brother and helper of all those who needed help. This must be the spirit of their lives. Their fellowship should help them to bring love into the world; to be sympathetic with the sick and sorrowful; to be charitable in judgment; to be active in the work of social amelioration.

Mr. E. Oldfield (Sheffield) spoke on Guilds and Religious Expression. Taking up a remark of the Chairman as to the inheritance of the present generation, he claimed that they, as members of society, were in duty bound to give to those who came after them as great, if not greater, opportunity of living a full and happy life as they themselves possessed. Guild members should look upon themselves as guardians of the life of the children in our Sunday-schools, and should seek to impart by example as well as precept the glorious truths which religion involves. The effect of the practical expression of the ideals of Guild members would be to strengthen the bond of fellowship in the church and combine worshippers for active service in the social field. Guild members should endeavour to stimulate thought and feeling among themselves; strengthen their characters; and prepare themselves for showing to the world their love to God and man.

All the addresses were listened to with deep attention; and a vote of thanks to the readers and the Chairman was proposed by the Rev. H. Gow, seconded by the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth.

Tea was provided by the members of the Old Meeting Guild, after which an organ recital was given in the church by Mr. A. J. Cotton (organist), followed by a religious service conducted by the Rev. E. D. P. Evans and A. A. Charlesworth; addresses being delivered by Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., and the Rev. H. Gow, B.A.

The devotional service was greatly aided by the beautiful music which was rendered by the Old Meeting Choir and organist, and the evening service brought to a conclusion a day of much interest to all concerned.

The Grateful Fish.

It has been supposed by many people that what are called the "lower" animals are not so sensitive to pain as we are, and this is believed by some to be especially the case as regards fish, who, being cold-blooded creatures, are not capable of feeling pain (so these people think), or, at any rate, do so to a small extent only. But sensitiveness to pain does not depend on the fact of the blood being warm or cold, but on the development of the nervous organisation. Careful observation of an injured animal will soon show whether it is suffering, and the story I am going to tell you is a clear proof that a fish is capable of feeling not only pain, but gratitude also. It is quite true, and really happened many years ago to my grandfather, Dr. Warwick. I heard the story first when I was a little girl, and lately I came across it in an old magazine, in a report of a meeting at which Dr. Warwick had himself told of the occurrence. He was living at the time near Dunham Park, the seat of the Earl of Stamford and Warrington, in Cheshire, and walking in the Park one evening he came to a pond where fish, intended for the table, were temporarily kept. He took particular notice of a pike of about 6 lbs. weight, which, when it observed him, darted hastily away. In doing so, it struck its head against an iron hook in a post in the water, and, as it afterwards appeared, fractured its skull and blinded itself in one eye. The agony shown by the poor fish seemed intense; it darted to the bottom, bored its head into the mud, and whirled itself round and round. Then it plunged about the pond, and at last threw itself completely out of the water on to the bank.

Dr. Warwick went and examined it, and found that a very small portion of the brain was protruding from the fracture in the skull. He carefully replaced this, and with a small silver toothpick raised the indented portion of the skull. The fish remained still for a short time, and he then put it back into the pond. It appeared at first a good deal relieved, but in a few minutes it again darted and plunged about, until it threw itself out of the water a second time. Again Dr. Warwick did what he could to relieve it, and again put it into the water. It continued for several times to throw itself out of the pond, and with the help of the keepers he at length made a kind of pillow for the fish, which was then left in the pond to its fate. When he came down to the pond next morning the pike came towards him to the edge of the water, and actually laid its head upon his foot. He examined the fish's skull, and found it going on all right; he then walked backwards and forwards along the edge of the pond for some time, and the fish continued to swim up and down, turning wherever he turned, but, being blinded on the wounded side of its head, it always seemed distressed when it had that side towards the bank, as it could not then see the doctor.

Next day he took some of his family down to see the fish, my mother being one of the party, and it was from her that I first heard the story. The fish came to him as before, and at length he actually taught it to come to him at his whistle and feed out of his hands, though with other people it continued shy, as fish usually are. This story seems to prove three things about the fish; first, that it could feel intense pain; second, that it had the power of hearing as well as seeing, which up to that time had been doubted by naturalists; and third, that it could and did feel gratitude for the help and kindness it received in its trouble, and this is especially remarkable, as the pike is considered one of the fiercest of all the fishes. Dr. Warwick realised the truth of what Coleridge says, and acted on it:—

He prayeth best, who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God that loveth us,
He made and loveth all.

ANOTHER STERN FIGHT FOR RELIGIOUS EQUALITY.

We spoke last week about the Education Bill, and entered into the objections to it at some length. We recur to the subject without apology : those who know the importance of the case will not need one ; those who do not perceive it, need to have their eyes opened.

The Bill evidently springs from two main sources. First, there is a growing belief that the duty of providing a good education for its citizens is one that should be brought home more closely to the nation's daily life. Hitherto, in spite of the enormous improvement brought about by the establishment of School Boards, there has been too great a tendency to suppose that "Government" is our one national Providence, and that, having an Education Department permanently engaged in supervising the work, people at large need trouble themselves little about it. The fact is, however, that unless there is a strong body of opinion to support public officials in carrying out the law they more or less inevitably shrink from putting pressure on defaulters ; and this reluctance is naturally increased when the defaulters' friends are temporarily in power. If the responsibility could be saddled upon the different localities, just as, e.g., in case of provision for the maintenance of paupers, would not the subject receive greater attention ?

The School Boards are a step in the right direction, but they are not universal ; and in rural districts particularly their career as educational bodies has not always been satisfactory. The Bill, it is clear, aims at making general what has been at the best only partial hitherto ; and, as we said last week, we shall not complain of the extinction of School Boards, if the work they have done is handed over to bodies equally responsible to the public and equally or better fitted to carry out the public mandate. If by grouping into larger areas the less active village Boards can be merged in a system of really efficient county Boards, so much the better. Best of all, if the new local administrators, call them by what name we will, are charged not only with the duty of providing elementary instruction, but with the care of secondary and higher instruction as well. So far as the new measure looks in this direction we believe it is welcomed as a sign that a great reform is at the doors, though whether the present Government is able to bring it into our midst is another question.

The grounds for doubting the prospects of the Bill are obvious. We have already referred to some of them. What is wanted in this matter is a keenly sensitive public conscience, alive to the needs and high aspirations of the district. What is offered by the Bill is a system of insulation by which the local authorities will be secured as carefully as possible from direct contact with the popular mind. No doubt, the popular mind is exposed to fits of unreason and to periods of sleepiness. It needs no long experience of politics, national or local, to induce considerable sympathy with the Miltonic dictum that the people are often "a herd confused, a miscellaneous rabble who extol things vulgar," and praise "they know not what." In such a mood, the ideal of a few wise men acting benevolently for the public good and independently of public passion is charming. But, somehow, the experience of mankind supports Milton the champion of democracy, rather than the poet who, through the lips of the Regainer of Paradise, coldly sets aside the seductions of demagogy. We all know, and Sir John Gorst has never tired of reminding us, that even the great Boards such as those of Birmingham, Manchester, and notably London, are elected by far less than the whole number of voters. This lethargy is lamentable ; but it will not be cured by leaving the masses to "sleep on," while an obscure Committee, obscurely elected, does vicariously the duties of the whole community. If an Act be passed to universalise the system of local education Boards, let them be directly answerable to the people in whose interests they are to work, and whose money they are to spend. The plan suggested in the Bill, of removing the new Committees from direct contact with the people through the ballot-box, is a capital instance of the enduring vitality of good old-fashioned Toryism ; and it ought to be beaten in the good old-fashioned way.

But the second source of the present Bill is less commendable, for it is a selfish, or at best a sectarian one. The Church schools have long been (as the cant phrase is) "in danger." They have, it is true, been favoured with the utmost leniency by inspectors and Government officials. They have had the advantage of being associated with the sect that calls itself the Church of England, a sect which far exceeds all others in wealth, a sect, too, which till a generation ago monopolised the chie places of learning and culture in the land. In spite of all, they have been, as a class, poorly equipped, poorly staffed, poor in educational results. In one thing only have they been strong—namely, the sectarianism that excluded teachers who were not Anglicans. Now it is proposed to complete that surrender to their managers which has been long on the point of completion. The camel's head, hump, and whole back have long had possession of the tent ; why complain when the tail is to follow ! As Dr. Crosskey long ago pointed out (would he were with us to fight the old battle again !) seven-eighths or so of the Voluntary schools have been paid out of the public money. On the plea that one-eighth or less came from private pockets, the clergy have been allowed to insist on teaching a system of doctrine which to a very large portion of the public is repulsive, and to exclude teachers, no matter how efficient and morally irreproachable, who do not profess that doctrine. Since, under stress of the "intolerable burden" on private subscribers, the political party still in power gave a huge lump of public money to relieve its friends, the quota of private money has naturally decreased. Now we come to the vanishing point, and when we ask why in the name of justice these schools should continue to be private nurseries for one sect, the only answers appear to be such as these :—(1) They have always been so ; (2) the buildings occupied represent a great wealth of capital hard to replace ; and (3) the Church is the Church, and ought not only to be in possession of the Church schools (which the nation pays for), but also of all others. On the whole, we like the last reason best. It is thorough, it is consistent. The new way with Dissenters (as ingenious Mr. Defoe would say) is to punish them well for their temerity in thinking for themselves. Force their children into Church schools first as scholars—so that they may learn to abjure the deadly sin of schism—next as teachers, should they aspire to the teaching profession. Finally, and all along indeed, make these wicked (or stupid) people pay for the bolstering up of the system which they reject. We shall see whether the Dissenters put up with it. As to the second of the pleas advanced, we only ask those who are so strictly economical that they will, for the price of school-buildings, surrender justice and liberty, once names dear to them, how many times over they could buy out the holders of these buildings, or erect infinitely better schools with a fraction of the sum spent to secure justice and liberty for the Outlanders of the Transvaal. But, surely, the most forcible plea, after all, is the first ; for if these unjust things had not been done for many years, who is so unjust as to propose them ?

We rejoice to see that at meetings held here and there in our religious community the subject is receiving attention, and that the pulpits are not silent. It is weary work, at times, fighting the battle of religious equality; but the veterans are just those who will weary least. What we want especially is to stir the younger men and women to a sense of the importance of the battle which is upon us.

THE PENSION FUND AND THE CONFERENCE.

SIR,—Has it occurred to Mr. Mellor and those who think with him, in their ideas of the relation between the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund and the National Conference, that if they had put forward their views before the appeal for subscriptions there might possibly have been no fund, or at all events but a smaller one, for which to frame a constitution at all? For myself, when I promised my contribution, I had not thought out a scheme for working the Fund, but with my present knowledge of the tone and temper of some of the members of the National Conference, I should, to say the least, have thought twice before entrusting my subscription to an irresponsible and non-representative body such as the Conference, irresponsible to, and non-representative of, the donors and subscribers, who have been the real authors, though they were not the initiators, of the Fund. It would seem that these gentlemen, by claiming for the Conference the right of determining the scheme of management of funds that it had not subscribed, would wish to supersede the old liberal principle of no taxation without representation, and substitute for it representation, or power, without taxation.

Of course in what I have written I speak for myself only, but I fancy I shall not be alone among the donors in the view I have expressed. And I would strongly commend to the notice of the dissentients in this matter the lucid exposition of the position given by Mr. Rawson in his letter in your last issue.

GOD'S SACRIFICE.

SIR,—Condensed reports of sermons are often misleading, and isolated statements, which the context might have explained, stand out in a startling abruptness which is very provocative of a challenge. This surely must be the case with the report of a sermon by the Rev. R. T. Herford, in your last issue.

I refer especially to the amazing statement—"Sacrifice on the part of God is unintelligible." Believing that the life of God is perpetual sacrifice; believing also in that great utterance, "God so loved the world that he gave His only begotten Son," I feel constrained respectfully to ask Mr. Herford why, and to whom, "sacrifice on the part of God is unintelligible"?

THE BOSTON BENEVOLENT FRATERNITY.

OUR readers will remember the Rev. C. W. Wendté as Secretary of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at the meeting in London last year. Mr. Wendté has been good enough to send us the following account of the great religious and social work with which he is now connected as Secretary of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches, together with this letter:—

Boston, March 15, 1902.

YOUR recent report and editorials concerning the London Domestic Mission Society move me to give you some account of its sister-organisation in the United States, "The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston (Unitarian)." In motive and aims it closely resembles your own Association. Its methods, owing largely to the remarkable blending of different nationalities and races, languages, manners and customs and religions in American city life, will be found somewhat at variance with your own. This may render my presentation none the less interesting to your readers.—Sincerely yours,

CHAS. W. WENDTÉ.
Secretary, Benevolent Fraternity of Churches in Boston (Unitarian).

The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches is one of the most characteristic and widely useful of the philanthropic institutions of Boston. To-day, after nearly seventy years of religious and humanitarian activity, it is engaged as earnestly as ever before in its history in ministering to the needs and elevating the condition of the less-favoured classes of our population.

The Benevolent Fraternity was founded in 1834 by a group of thoughtful and philanthropic students of the social problems presented by city life, among whom the Revs. Dr. William Ellery Channing and Dr. Joseph Tuckerman were especially prominent. From the very first it was based on the great principles of personal responsibility, brotherly feeling, social service, and religious duty which underlie the benevolent activities of the present day and may be said, in a measure, to have anticipated them all. There are, doubtless, those who conceive of the Benevolent Fraternity as a movement on the part of the wealthy and cultivated classes of Boston to extend charity and religious influences to the poor and degraded, while keeping them at a safe distance from their churches and homes. But nothing could have been further removed from the spirit of the founders of the Benevolent Fraternity than such an arrogant and unbrotherly attitude. In the presence of the terrible problems of poverty, ignorance, temptation and strife induced by our present unjust and unequal distribution of the privileges of life, they saw clearly the need for a system of cordial, respectful, brotherly co-operation. Dr. Channing, writing to Dr. Tuckerman on the subject of "The Ministry at Large," said, "If you can succeed in awakening in the more opulent and improved class an enlightened and active concern for the moral and religious improvement of their less-favoured brethren, will you not accomplish a greater good than by any other labours?" He fully appreciated that the benefits to be received were mutual, and that the wealthy and cultivated classes were quite as much in need of missionary and humanitarian endeavour as their less-favoured brethren in the social body.

Dr. Channing in this very letter continues: "The object of our religion is to establish a fraternal union among all classes of society, to break down our present distinctions, and to direct all the energies of the cultivated and virtuous to the work of elevating the depressed classes to an enlightened piety, to intellectual and moral dignity." A new spirit, he says, should possess all who labour in this cause. "The signs of the times point to a great modification of society, founded on the essential truth that the chief end of the social state is the elevation of all its members as intelligent and moral beings. The present selfish, dissocial system must give way to Christianity. The time is come when religious bodies will be estimated by the good they do, when creeds are to be less the test of the Christian." Finally, Dr. Channing asks "whether it may not be made the leading trait of a Unitarian, that he is a man who sympathises with, and respects, the less-favoured classes of society, and that he is pledged to use all his powers for their elevation."

This was the spirit in which the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches was founded and these the principles on which it rests. In Dr. Tuckerman, the first Minister at Large, it possessed a worthy exponent of this controlling sentiment. Not patronising pity but brotherly love was his motive. As Dr. Channing said of him—

He was distinguished by recognising the capacities and claims of the poor as intellectual and moral beings. He did not go among them to teach them submission to their betters, but to teach that they were equally objects of the Divine love with the greatest of their race, and that their condition contained the means of the true happiness and glory of human beings. His reports were all fitted to give the poor a different place in the minds of the rich, and to break down the barriers which have hitherto separated these classes of society.

The successors of Dr. Tuckerman in the Ministry at Large in Boston have kept in view these principles, and have been measurably successful in their application. They have cherished a belief in the intrinsic worth and ideal possibilities of human nature, the equality of all men before God, the unity and brotherhood of the race, the duty of the stronger to help the weaker members of the community. In earlier days they found their chief usefulness in conducting free services of public worship, in personal visitation and religious conversation among the poor and the unchurched, and incidental works of love and mercy. As city life grew more complex, and the population of Boston more heterogeneous and unstable, these earlier methods of the Ministry at Large have undergone great changes to adapt them to the changed circumstances and needs of city life, especially the social problems presented by modern industrialism and our large foreign immigration. With a population of about 500,000, and as many more resident in the suburbs, there are to-day more foreign elements in Boston than there are native Americans. The Irish preponderate; but there are also many Germans, English, French Canadians, Italians, Slavs, and Russian Jews, &c.

At the present day the fraternity is controlled by Unitarian churches in Boston through a board of delegates, and supported by annual contributions to supplement its own invested funds. Its property is valued at $500,000. The annual contributions of the churches to it total about $6,000. It maintains a central office at the Theodore Parker Memorial Building, and sustains five branches in different localities in the city, each engaged in a distinctive and characteristic work.

Thus Bullfinch-place Church, with several paid workers and many volunteers, represents more the older tradition of a religious mission among the poor and unchurched. Its field is the West-end, a crowded district with heterogeneous populations greatly needing personal and uplifting influences. By its house-to-house visitation and religious services, its boys and girls' clubs, large Sunday-school, classes for instruction, and in other ways, it is a quiet, pervasive influence for good in that quarter of the city.

The North-end Union replaces the former Parmenter-street Chapel. The almost exclusively Jewish and Italian population which has taken possession of that part of Boston makes specifically religious work, in the usual sense, unfruitful. The North-end Union maintains a reading-room, technical and other classes, lectures, entertainments, and a fine gymnasium, and through one of its staff, resident in the building, carries on a systematic visitation in the district. Nearly a hundred young men are taught trades, such as printing and plumbing, in its well-equipped shops, under the direction of master printers and plumbers, who grant certificates for work done, and in part support the institution. Several hundred boys and girls are taught other useful arts. There is a Sunday-school for upbuilding in character and good citizenship. The whole edifice is a busy hive of industries and good influences, only impeded by the limited quarters and resources of the movement.

Morgan Chapel is a legacy from an earnest and eccentric Methodist preacher, who at death bequeathed his work and this property to the Benevolent Fraternity, with the proviso that it should always be shepherded by a minister of the Methodist Connection. The Fraternity accepted the trust and co-operates loyally with that denomination in carrying on this mission. It is now erecting a large and admirably-arranged edifice, at a cost of $50,000, on the original site at the south end. The new building will be opened in May, and greatly facilitate what is already one of the most efficient of city ministries among the poor. Sixty per cent. of its attendants at public worship are coloured people. There would seem to be no colour line in this church. In its day-nursery ten nationalities are represented. Its work for temperance is especially remarkable. Besides its five paid workers, it has a large force of volunteers, chiefly from the Boston University and the Deaconesses' Training School, who carry on a great variety of philanthropic and religious enterprises. This work is pervaded and upborne by an ardent and often very emotional but always sincere piety.

Channing Church, Dorchester, has recently moved into its beautiful new edifice, and in place of a former dying mission in South Boston amid hostile, or at all events unresponsive foreign elements, we have here a vigorous young suburban church, sooner or later to be self-supporting.

Finally, the Parker Memorial, now owned and controlled by the Benevolent Fraternity, has recently been in part reconstructed and converted into a headquarters for all this work and an Institutional Church. It aims to reach the young men and women especially, who, to the number of many thousands, are in lodgings at the South-end, and to become to them an attractive place of assembly. It offers them entertainments, companionship and social opportunities, and for their more serious needs classes in industrial and useful arts and the higher culture of books, lectures, social service and religious worship. The children are not omitted from this programme. A large boys' club with almost daily access to the gymnasium and reading and game rooms, and classes in music, dancing, embroidery, elocution, &c., are essential features of the work. There is also a large Mothers' Club with weekly sessions. The Boston Public Library has established a public reading-room in the building. The Wednesday evening lectures and entertainments are largely attended. The Sunday evening services, with singing by a chorus choir of thirty young people, are succeeded by an informal "sociable," in the parlours adjoining the main hall, at which music, simple refreshments and an occasional address are the attraction. The stereopticon is largely used. Much charitable work is done in connection. About a dozen other organisations, the Flower Mission, Sphinx Club, Martha and Mary Society, Working Women's Clubs, Settlements, &c., accept the hospitalities of the building. The latter is open from 9 A.M. to 10 P.M. during the week. The Sunday service is at 8 P.M. A characteristic feature of the work at the Parker Memorial is that its constituency is almost entirely American.

In these and other ways the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches keeps up its honourable record of Christian service, and ever tries to improve upon it. It employs some forty or fifty paid workers, wholly or for a part of their time, and on its committees and board of delegates are many of the most prominent and earnest charity religious workers in the city. It begins the New Century with heart and hope, and sends across the seas a greeting to its sister organisations in Great Britain.

METHODS OF CLASS TEACHING.*

BY MISS A. M. SUDBERY.

I asked one of the members of the Committee of this Society what was expected of me as to the treatment of the subject, and I was told that, if possible, I should try to state just the methods I use in conducting my own class. I conscientiously tried to follow this counsel, but found that to teach and to say how you teach are two very different matters. The result of my efforts appeared to me very uninteresting—not at all original—and certainly did not contain much matter for discussion.

Unfortunately I cannot give my undivided attention to my class of girls, so I thought that I would try to tell you my method of preparing and presenting a lesson, Sunday by Sunday, to the larger class of about fifty to sixty children, to which I make it a practice to talk for about ten to fifteen minutes each week.

Before attempting to do this, I will let you have the result of my endeavours to strictly follow the given subject, and give you a simple statement of the way in which I conduct a class of about half-a-dozen girls, ages twelve to sixteen.

I find it advisable to have a subject which can be continued from week to week, and usually make one or other of the books published by the S.S.A. the basis of my lessons. At present I am taking Miss Cooke's "Story of Dorothea Dix." After carefully reading a chapter ahead, and making a mental note of points in the story which can be enlarged upon, I tell the story in my own words, and find enough matter for a very interesting chat.

Each week before continuing the story I get the girls to tell me what they can remember of the last week's lesson—first one and then another of them tells me her impression. I put leading questions from time to time, until the ground has all been gone over. I especially try to find whether the chief points in the lesson have been grasped. Sometimes there is enough matter of interest arising from the recapitulation to engage the attention of the class for the whole lesson, and frequently it happens that a chance word of a scholar will open up a fresh line of thought or suggest another point of view.

Lessons somewhat on these lines are doubtless given in most schools in those classes where the teachers give any time to preparation during the week. The question of preparation is a very important one, and I would urge on all who hope to teach with any success—or with satisfaction to themselves or their scholars—to give, if possible, some time each week to thinking over the Sunday's lesson.

I must confess that I give more time and thought to the consideration of the form which my weekly address to the school is to take than to the preparation of my class lesson—and I have reasons for this which I should like to explain.

The system of addressing the children each week collectively, and trying to give them a definite lesson, can only be used successfully in a comparatively small school where the superintendent can rely on order and attention. I am fortunate in having under my care a school where these conditions are to be found.

I adopted the plan after careful consideration, chiefly for the two following reasons:—In the first place I felt it was important that the children should all have some thought given to them each Sunday which might be helpful or stimulating for the coming week. Now there is always the chance that one or other of the teachers may be absent, and that a class may be taken by an inexperienced or unprepared substitute whose only idea of teaching is to read a story book to the class or to let the children read a portion of the Bible in turn—verse by verse—without giving any explanation of the meaning.

An address might, to some extent, in a case like this supply the need of a lesson. The other reason I had for adopting the system was that I hoped perhaps sometimes either the subjects I chose or the methods I used in treating those subjects might be of some little help to the younger and less experienced teachers in preparing future lessons. I try to make the addresses as suggestive as possible, and there is plenty of opportunity often for continuing and developing an idea which I am only able to touch upon in the short time at my disposal.

I think that those who wish to teach should keep their minds very open to suggestions from all possible sources; they should train themselves to be receptive of impressions and to keep their imaginations free, then to endeavour to convey the impressions which they had themselves received as vividly and enthusiastically as possible to the children. One can only teach what one feels with one's whole heart to be true—half-heartedness in teaching or anything else is no good to anybody.

For those who do not select a subject which is to form the theme for a series of lessons—but who prefer to think out a separate and complete lesson each week—the power of being able to make the most of the little commonplace incidents of every-day life, and to draw from them lessons and illustrations, is a very valuable one—it is, indeed, one which should be cultivated by every teacher; for we want to help the children to get the best out of life—out of the commonplace—to teach them to find beauties where they would never have suspected them without our help, to learn the uses and beauties of shadows—and grey days—as well as to love the sunshine and flowers of the world.

Character-building seems to me to be the chief work which a Sunday-school should endeavour to accomplish, and I believe in letting the children know that we are striving to help them to develop their natures and become strong in character.

At the beginning of last year I talked to them for several Sundays on this subject. It was just at the time when preparations were being made to build our new church. Here was something that could be used as an illustration, something which they could see and understand, and in which they were beginning to feel a keen interest. Foundations were being dug—we made one Sunday's talk about foundations. Why are they necessary? Can they be put in after the building is up? What happens when they are weak or not deep enough? &c.

Of course, the reading for that day was the parable of the "house built on a rock." We spoke of foundation-stones (the stone-laying ceremony was the event of that week). Should we have a foundation-stone of our own, with an inscription to remind us that we, like the church, are here for a purpose? Then came suggestions for inscriptions.

It is my custom to question the children, and it was surprising to see the interest with which they entered into this subject and found for themselves similarities between the material and spiritual qualifications needful for good building. The reading of Longfellow's poem, "The Builders," helped us in the development of the idea. I can only remember a few of the points touched on, such as bricks—laid on one by one—should be sound; the mortar something strong which will bind the whole together; could we make Love our mortar? The architect's work; the thought and care in the design may be marred by the builder; God the architect of our house of character; we must be faithful builders, and so on.

I give only the rough outline. Wherever possible I introduced stories which would still further impress the lesson on the minds of the children.

Always I ask for the main points of the previous week's lesson before going on to present fresh ideas.

I heard, long after I had given this series of lessons, that one of the younger teachers found matter enough suggested by the addresses for several lessons in her class of boys.

I like when possible to choose hymns for the opening service which have some connection in idea with the subject of the address, and try to make the whole service as harmonious as possible. Occasionally I allow my girls to select the hymns for the following Sunday; then I have to make my address fit in with the hymns chosen. A short time ago one girl was very anxious that we should have the hymn "I was a Wandering Sheep." I agreed to have it, and as we had already selected opening and closing hymns this one had to follow the address; consequently, if I was to fit my address to that, the obvious subject was the "Parable of the Lost Sheep."

The children were very familiar with the parable and the lesson that it is intended to convey. I felt I must try to present it to them in a somewhat different manner than heretofore. I decided, instead of reading the parable and then talking about its meaning in the usual way, to lead up to it and read it at the end of my address, so I started by telling the children that I was going to talk to them about "Teaching." Did they wonder at that? They came to Sunday-school to learn, not to teach! Why should I talk to them about teaching? Were they ever teachers, or could they be if they liked? Many of them had young brothers and sisters who were ignorant about very many things which were quite well understood by all of those to whom I was speaking. I asked them to suppose that they were telling a small brother Tommy a story about a king in olden times, a good king. Tommy might want to know what a king is? How would they try to explain? Could they not compare him to a kind of father who has a great many children, so many that they can't all live in their father's house, but have different houses. They all obey him and love him; some work for him and some protect him from danger. Sometimes some of these children are naughty and have to be punished by the king to make them good again, just as Tommy is sometimes naughty and his father has to punish him. The good king is sorry when he has to punish his children, just as Tommy's father is when he has to punish him, and so on. Then I made one or two other suggestions how, with a little kindness and patience, they might be very good teachers, young though some of them were.

Then I asked if they could tell me of someone who once tried to teach—not children—but people who were something like children. Many hands were put up, and I got the answer I wanted—Jesus. How did Jesus teach? Yes, very often by telling stories; but what else did he do? No suggestions. Did not he try to make them understand about things which they had never seen, by comparing them with things they had seen, in the same way as you might compare the king (whom Tommy had never seen) with the father (whom Tommy knew and loved)?

When Jesus was giving a lesson about teaching he talked of a sower. (Yes! I could see they all knew the parable.) Well, very likely at the very minute Jesus was speaking there was a man sowing seed in a field close by to whom he pointed when he said, "Behold the sower."

There was one thing Jesus very much wanted to make the people understand, and that was the kind of love which his Father, and their Father—God—whom they had never seen, felt for them, and he chose many ways of trying to make it easy for them to realise something of this love. Sometimes he compared God to a wise master with many servants, or to a father (an earthly father) as in the parable of the "Prodigal Son." There was one comparison which the people who were listening to him would understand very well, and that was when he spoke of God as a shepherd. Why would they understand that particularly well? Because many people kept sheep in Palestine.

Then I read the parable, and with a few questions found that the children understood the meaning underlying the story; but I made the point of my lesson in this instance the method which Jesus had employed in giving his lesson.

These two examples I have given can only indicate the general tendency of my efforts towards helping in character-building. I have only sketched in roughest outline suggestions, as I said before; the actual lessons themselves are often more suggestive than finished and complete, and these are only recollections of past lessons.

In conclusion. Can any of us do better than study carefully, and lovingly, and reverently the methods which were used by one whom we all acknowledge to be the greatest teacher the world has ever known? I think we must not forget, however, that before we think of methods, or systems, or subjects, there is one thing which we ourselves must possess, something which was the secret of the influence of Jesus, of Buddha, of all the great teachers in history, and that is Love. We must feel love for and sympathy with those we want to teach before we even begin to think of methods of class or any other kind of teaching.

THE SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

CENTENARIES CHAPEL.

The Easter meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association were held at Capel-y-groes, Cardiganshire, on Wednesday and Thursday week. They were also the occasion of celebrating the centenary of the local congregation, which was one of the first organised in South Wales on a Unitarian basis. The chapel is situated in what is generally known as "the Unitarian district" of Cardiganshire, there being within a radius of eight or ten miles no less than twelves churches. It is also within three miles of Lampeter, which has the Welsh Church college, known as "St. David's College." As reported in our last issue, the first chapel was built in 1802, mainly through the efforts of Dr. Charles Lloyd, and the congregation was formed by the secession of several members from neighbouring chapels, who were dissatisfied with the Arian theology taught thereat. In the same year also Pantdefaid was built. This chapel is situated about eight miles distant from Capel-y-groes, in a north-westerly direction. For a great part of the century both chapels were under the pastoral care of the same minister. The joint pastorate terminated on the retirement of the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., in 1894, who had served the two congregations for about forty years. At that time Pantdefaid was united to Graig Chapel, Llandyssul, and at Capel-y-groes Mr. Thomas was succeeded by the Rev. E. E. Jenkins. In 1899 Mr. Jenkins relinquished the pastorate in order to enter Manchester College for a further course of study, and since then Capel-y-groes has been under the same pastoral care as Cribyn, which is situated about two miles distant. The congregation has been a flourishing one throughout its history, and many of its sons have from time to time entered the ministry; three are now in the ministry, and two others are students at our colleges.

There was a large attendance of members at the meetings, including the Revs. Thomas Thomas, J.P., John Davies (Allt-y-placa), R. C. Jones (Lampeter), W. James. B.A., J.P., president and secretary of the Association; J. Hathren Davies (Cefn), T. A. Thomas (Llandyssul), T. J. Jenkins (Gellionen), Lewis Williams (Rhydygwm), D. Rees (Pentre), D. Evans (Cwmbach), D. Evans, minister of the place; Professor Weatherall, M.A. (Carmarthen), H. Robinson (Abercynon), E. E. Jenkins (Oxford), and the following students:—J. Evans, B.A., Simon Jones, B.A., Islan Jones, B.A., E. Jenkins, D. Davies, Parke Davies, and D. J. Davies, B.A. The meetings were also made noteworthy by the presence of the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was making his first visit to our Cardiganshire churches. The services were well attended throughout, there being present on Thursday about 400 people.

SERVICES AND BUSINESS MEETING.

On Wednesday evening two sermons were delivered by the Revs. D. Evans and D. Rees. The committee met at 9.30 on Thursday, for the transaction of business, the chief items being the following:—(1) The Revs. W. James, B.A., J.P., R. J. Jones, M.A., and J. Davies were appointed representatives of the Association to act as advisory committee in conjunction with a similar number from the South-East Wales Society; (2) The Rev. T. J. Jenkins was appointed delegate to the annual meetings of the B. and F.U.A.; (3) a grant was made towards Postal Mission work, which branch of the Association's activity is under the care of the Rev. L. Williams, and advertisements were directed to be inserted in various Welsh papers; (4) it was resolved to publish the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's booklet, "Back to Jesus," in Welsh, the translation having already been done by the Rev. J. H. Davies; (5) it was also resolved to support the services which are intended to be held during the summer months at Aberystwyth.

The first public service on Thursday commenced at 10.30, the Rev. W. James, B.A., acting in the place of the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., the appointed preacher, who could not fulfil his engagement owing to illness. The preacher dealt with what the late Professor Henry Drummond defined as the three outstanding departments of the church—namely, criticism, dogmatism, and evangelism, and illustrated the history of Capel-y-groes congregation in the light of these principles. He was followed by the Rev. Thomas Thomas, J.P., who gave a historical address, dealing with the origin of the church, the succession of ministers, and the progress of Unitarian ideas in the district.

CONFERENCE—THE EDUCATION BILL.

A conference was held in the afternoon, when the President (the Rev. W. James) occupied the chair, and gave to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie a cordial welcome. Mr. Bowie made an eloquent reply, dwelling upon the immediate lessons of the centenary meetings, the remarkable spread of the Unitarian movement in Cardiganshire, and the great encouragement afforded to the progress of Liberal ideas by the trend of public opinion. In closing he referred to the present crisis in education, and dealt in an effective way with the Bill recently introduced by Mr. Balfour. He was followed by Professor Weatherall, Revs. J. H. Davies, D. Rees, E. E. Jenkins, and John Davies. At the end of the meeting the following resolution was passed unanimously:—

That this meeting of the Unitarians of South Wales condemns the Education Bill now before Parliament for the following reasons:—(1) That the Committees to which it is intended under this Bill to entrust the management of the schools will not be elected directly for this purpose, nor responsible to the public, and that they are unsuited to take the place of the present School Boards; (2) That it provides for the maintenance of voluntary schools out of the rates without any effective public control; (3) That the provision re the building of schools would multiply rather than lessen the number of sectarian schools, which could not but be detrimental to the progress of education.

The minister of the place proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. W. C. Bowie for his presence, and referred appreciatively to the sympathy and encouragement which he in common with our co-religionists in English have always been ready to extend to our Welsh churches. Mr. Bowie suitably replied.

In the evening another preaching service was held, when sermons were delivered by the Revs. T. J. Jenkins and J. H. Davies. The four services were introduced by the Revs. Simon Jones, B.A., J. Davies, L. Williams, and H. Robinson.

CENTENARY MEETING AT PANTDEFAID, NEAR LLANDYSSUL.

On Friday evening the Pantdefaid congregation celebrated the hundredth birthday of the cause there. As stated above, it and Capel-y-groes date from 1802, and are the oldest avowedly Unitarian chapels in Cardiganshire, if not in South Wales. In consequence of the meetings of the South Wales Unitarian Association, which were held at Capel-y-groes the previous day, a large number of ministers and students were present, and the large chapel was filled with an interested audience. Amongst those in attendance were the following ministers:—The Revs. Thomas Thomas, J.P., W. Copeland Bowie, John Davies, W. James, B.A., J.P., D. Evans, J. Tyssul Davis, T. J. Jenkins, D. Rees, D. Evans; Students, E. E. Jenkins, John Evans, B.A., Simon Jones, B.A., E. O. Jenkins, J. Park Davies, and T. Arthur Thomas (pastor loci).

After reading and prayer by D. Evans, the Rev. T. Thomas was voted to the chair. After briefly explaining the object of the meeting, he called on the Rev. W. James, who delivered an eloquent tribute to the Unitarian fathers for their sacrifices and faithfulness in the face of temptations and discouragement.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie followed and said that he had visited almost all our chapels in Cardiganshire, and he did not know of any district in England, Scotland, or Ireland to be compared to this "black spot," as it was sometimes called, where Unitarian Churches were so thickly planted and flourishing. It spoke of the devotion and heroism of those founders in the early part of the century. At the end of an eloquent address, he urged the young people to be faithful to the traditions and principles of their inheritance. The Revs. D. Rees, Tyssul Davies, T. J. Jenkins, and J. Davies followed.

After the singing of hymn a most successful and inspiring meeting was brought to a close.

MR. BOWIE'S VISIT.

During his stay Mr. Bowie has, besides attending these centenary celebrations, visited all our chapels in Cardiganshire, and preached three times on Sunday at New Court, Cribyn, and Lampeter. There was a crowded congregation at each of the three places, the Town Hall of the latter place, where the service was held owing to the local chapel having been pulled down, and which is capable of holding 500 people, being quite full. Mr. Bowie's visit has given great satisfaction to all our churches, and cannot but be the cause of renewed vigour and life.

Our Welsh correspondent, writing last week of the centenaries, and prevented himself by ill-health from being present at the meetings, fell into an error in saying that the centenary of the South Wales Association was to be celbrated at Capel-y-groes. That celebration is to be held three months hence at Gellionen, when the President will deliver his address.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

SOUTH-EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The annual meeting of this Society was held on Monday, April 7, at the West Grove Unitarian Church, Cardiff, the President, H. Woolcott Thompson, Esq., in the chair.

Delegates were present from the various churches connected with the Society. We are sorry to have to report that some of our most active members were absent owing to the fact that municipal elections were taking place in various towns on that day, and some of our leading men were engaged in the contests. It is with peculiar pleasure that we congratulate our respected and deservedly popular treasurer, Mr. N. L. Williams, of Aberdare, on his being returned for his ward by an overwhelming majority. Mr. Williams's services have been invaluable on the council of his native town.

The executive met in the morning at 11 30 for the transaction of preliminary business, and the general committee met at 12.30. Reports were received from churches, which were, on the whole, deemed satisfactory, especially when it is considered that, comparatively speaking, a large number of our pulpits are vacant—namely, Aberdare, Pontypridd, Bridgend, and Wick. The various reports from churches indicated that the work has been maintained with much self-sacrificing effort. Ministers and laymen have very readily come forward to help the congregations that have no ministers, and it is pleasant to record that services have been regularly held in all the churches, and that their efficiency is well maintained.

The Rev. D. J. Williams, hon. sec., read a draft annual report, which was adopted for presentation to the annual meeting. In this report the Committee stated they regretted that there was no substantial response to the appeal for increased subscriptions which they circulated through their last annual report. It was pointed out that the executive has undertaken to render financial aid to the movement at Bridgend, and that it is more than ever necessary that the local treasurers should be encouraged to obtain a larger list of subscribers. It was remarked that some of the friends have already very generously promised to contribute to this special branch of mission work, and it was hoped that their example will be taken up heartily by all friends who wish well to the cause. The report also touched on the unfortunate circumstance that so many churches are without ministers, but expressed the pleasure with which the Committee learnt that the work had been efficiently carried on in spite of this difficulty. Record was made of the reopening of the chapel at Bridgend. Week-night services have been conducted by various ministers. The Rev. W. J. Phillips, who has the oversight of this movement, has instituted Sunday services. On the whole the week-evening services have been well attended, and the result of the experiment considered satisfactory. The Sunday morning services have not been so well attended, but, as this is generally the case in most churches and chapels in the district, it was thought that when it will be possible to establish services on Sunday afternoons or evenings much better results will follow. The Committee expressed the hope that now the cause has been restarted a suitable minister will be found to take charge of Wick and Bridgend. On the motion of the President, the report was adopted for presentation to the annual meeting. Mr Ernest Williams, on behalf of the treasurer, presented the financial statement which showed a small balance in hand.

At 2 o'clock a religious service conducted by the Rev. D. Rees, of Pentre, was held, at which the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., preached the annual sermon. A collection was taken for the funds of the Society.

At 3 o'clock the annual meeting was held. The Rev. D. Williams presented the Committee's report, and Mr. John Lewis, hon. sec., on behalf of the treasurer, presented the financial statement.

On the motion of the President the annual report and treasurer's statement were adopted, and ordered to be printed and circulated.

Mrs. Lewis, Pontypridd, hon. sec. of the Postal Mission, gave an interesting account of the year's work. She explained that as two other Postal Missions had been established since ours was started five years ago, and as she did not think that there was room for so many to work in Wales with any advantage to the cause, she felt reluctantly compelled to tender her resignation.

Inasmuch as Mrs. Lewis is an ideal secretary of so important a branch of missionary work, and as she has been able to help many inquirers and to interest them in Unitarian thought and work, and has also received many grateful letters acknowledging their indebtedness to her, the meeting strongly urged on her to continue the work, even though there be danger of overlapping. The following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That in the opinion of this Society it is very desirable that the Postal Mission be continued, and that mutual arrangements should be made with the Welsh Postal Mission for the carrying on of the work to the best advantage, and that Mrs. Lewis be asked to continue as secretary."

The best thanks of the meeting were given to the Revs. D. Rees and A. N. Blatchford, B.A., for their services that afternoon.

A hearty vote of thanks was given to the retiring officers on the motion of Mr. W. A. Moore, the retiring President returning thanks on behalf of the officers and himself.

Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips, of Aberdare, was unanimously elected President for the ensuing year.

The other officers of the Society were re-elected; and after much appreciated addresses had been given by Dr. Blake Odgers, President B. & F.U.A., and the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, an interesting speech by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A., on the subject of "A Minister at Large," brought the meeting to a close.

At 7.30 a public meeting was held under the presidency of Mr. G. C. Thompson, when speeches on Unitarian Christianity were delivered by the chairman, Dr. Blake Odgers, Revs. A. N. Blatchford, W. Copeland Bowie and J. T. Davies. The speeches were all of a very high order, as we should expect from such a list of speakers; and seldom have such encouraging, helpful and inspiring addresses been delivered as were given by these prominent workers. The visit of Mr. Blatchford and the representatives of the British and Foreign will long be remembered by the delegates and the members of the local congregation as a red-letter day in the history of the Society.

Luncheon and tea were generously provided for the delegates and friends by the local congregation. The best thanks of the Society are due to the Cardiff friends for their hospitality.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdeen.—Anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, March 30, by the Rev. James Forrest, M.A., Glasgow. Attentive congregations listened with appreciation to his eloquent expositions of Unitarian ideas. On Monday, the 31st, the annual soirée was held in the Northern Friendly Society's Hall, the area of which was filled by the members and their friends. Stimulating addresses were given by Mr. William Cruickshank (chairman), the Rev. J. Forrest, and the Rev. A. Webster. The intervals were made cheerful by songs, drill display by children, &c. Good fellowship prevailed throughout, and the meeting was of an encouraging kind.

Allostock.—The special service in celebration of "Daffodil Sunday" was held on April 6. There was a large attendance, and the occasion was most enjoyable and uplifting. The Rev. G. A. Payne's discourse referred to the wonder and beauty of spring, and illustrations were copiously quoted from Wordsworth, Lord de Tabley, and other poets.

Chichester.—After serving six years on the Board of Guardians, the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott has been returned for another three years; he has also been reinstalled as a member of the Boarding-out, Asylum, and City Assessment Committees. Mrs. Hoddinott has been re-elected member of the Ladies' Visiting Committee.—On Thursday, the 3rd inst., the Sunday scholars, teachers, parents, and friends met, and passed a most enjoyable evening, the programme being a long and varied one, consisting of recitations by the younger scholars, and various musical selections, including a number of solos, by the teachers and members of the choir, accompanied by Miss Morley, senior teacher.

Clifton.—As a sign of the disappearance of sectarian animus, it is interesting to record that the newly-founded Bristol branch of the Christian Social Brotherhood (established under the auspices of the Free Church Council), has elected the Rev. Dr. Warschauer, M.A., a member of its committee. On Tuesday, April 8, Dr. Warschauer delivered the inaugural address on "The Basis of Social Reform," the invitation extended to him to do so being the more gratifying because the object of the meeting was to lay special emphasis on the Christian side of the movement. The address was received with the greatest cordiality, and the warm wish expressed that it might be circulated in print as an official publication of the society.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual meeting of the Union was held at Stepney on Saturday last. There were about twenty persons present. The secretary's and treasurer's reports were read and adopted; and a vote was passed expressing appreciation of the services of the Rev. W. G. Cadman, the retiring president. Mr. W. J. Noel was elected president, Mr. G. Ward vice-president, and Mrs. Wood and Mr. Edgar Noel were re-elected treasurer and secretary for the ensuing year. At the close of the business an excellent paper was read by Mr. F. Talbot on "The Limits of the Religion of Childhood," followed by a conference. The chair was taken by the Rev. W. H. Rose, of Walthamstow.

Evesham.—On Monday, Dr. Gore the new Bishop of Worcester, visited the town to confirm candidates at All Saints' Church. Before the service there was a large gathering at the Town Hall, where the Corporation of Evesham presented an address of welcome to Dr. Gore. The Mayor (Mr. G. Hughes), a member of the Oat-street Meeting House congregation, in presenting the address, said there had grown up in the neighbourhood a spirit of good feeling amongst all sects and all congregations, and he hoped Dr. Gore would use his great powers to foster and enlarge that spirit. The Rev. Rudolf Davis (Unitarian) presented an address of welcome, signed by himself, the Rev. H. B. Case (Baptist), and the Rev. F. Standfast (Wesleyan). This stated that his lordship's life and work had won their respect and admiration, and they rejoiced in his appointment. They were glad to be allowed to show honour to one whom they knew as a religious teacher, through printed work, to members of all churches. One fear which they earnestly hoped might not become a regret was lest the duties of Dr. Gore's high office should prevent his publishing in future such works as he had already published, which had been helpful and inspiring to a wider public than that of any diocese and to many far removed from the theological position of the Church of England, because of the religious spirit animating them. In reply, the Bishop said that it had been one of his great happinesses in life that he had always been able to maintain relations of friendship, sometimes close friendship, with Nonconformists. He was not able to rank himself amongst those who treated the differences between them as very small, but he was sure that they ought all to be able to labour together for all matters which concerned the social well-being of their countrymen and the places in which they lived, and they could co-operate as students of Holy Scripture. If they looked away from mutual differences and tried to refashion themselves after the pattern of the Church as their Lord created it he believed they would be insensibly joined together.

Ipswich.—On Sunday week the Rev. L. Tavener brought to a close an exceedingly interesting and useful series of Sunday evening sermons entitled "Suggestions for a Faith for the Twentieth Century." The course has occupied three months, and the subjects have included Man's Knowledge of God, The Future Life, Heaven and Hell, The Bible, Jesus Christ, Divine Fatherhood, and Human Brotherhood. The concluding sermon on Easter Sunday was on the Resurrection. Throughout the series the congregations have been large and steadily increasing, the number present on Easter Sunday being larger than on any previous occasion of an ordinary character for many years. It is proposed to follow up this definite Unitarian teaching by a course of lessons from the works of Dr. Martineau. Other branches of church work in Ipswich are also in a healthy condition. The Sunday-school is increasing, and additional teachers have volunteered their services. The Social Guild has continued its interesting weekly meetings, and two very successful social evenings were held in February, one for the children and one for adults, the latter realising a profit of over £2 for the chapel funds. Occasional lectures are being delivered, and the opportunity afforded by the recent visit of the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., to the Eastern Counties was made use of by asking him to deliver his lecture on India, which was followed with keen interest by all who heard it.

Kidderminster.—On Maundy Thursday, Good Friday, and Easter Sunday, the Guild of the Good Shepherd celebrated, by special services, its "Coming of Age." On Thursday evening the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham (President of the Guild Union), preached to a large congregation; on Friday evening the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans preached; and on Easter Sunday the Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds (Vice-President of the Guilds Union), preached to excellent congregations. The visits of the President and Vice-President were very much appreciated and enjoyed, and their sermons most inspiring. The guild is the oldest in our Unitarian group of churches, and has made an honoured name for itself in the town for philanthropic work. It has on its roll 160 members, and it has been of immense value to the church. The celebrations will be continued at the next monthly meeting, when the members will have an opportunity of having their say; and in the summer-time the guild will have its first excursion into the country, in honour of its twenty-first birthday. It is also suggested that the occasion shall be recorded in some permanent form, such as a stained-glass window in the chapel, or in some other way.

London: Highgate.—Speaking on Sunday evening, the Rev. R. H. Greaves gave a powerful criticism of the new Education Bill. On the previous Sunday evening he had spoken of the necessity of a thorough education for the individual's sake and the nation's. On Sunday last he strongly denounced the present Bill as feeble where it should be strong, and as in parts thoroughly mischievous. Amongst other remarks he said:—In face of experience, of right, and of reason, the Government proposes that, at the bidding of an unreasoning and unrighteous majority, none of whom save interested leaders of the unthinking mob are aware of the wrong that they are committing, we shall be compelled to hand over our money to "private and irresponsible managers" who, within certain limits that are far too broad, shall do with it as they think fit. The free citizens of a free country shall submit to taxation without representation, and shall be helpless, though their money is being spent in instilling into the minds of the next generation religious dogmas which some of them regard as positively blasphemous. It is not enough that we must be taxed to support a State church in which the majority of us do not believe, for now we are told that we must support its schools, wherever it can command a majority, and this, though its ministers and teachers are to be allowed in school hours to stigmatise us and ours as heretics and schismatics, to inform the children that it is "vulgar" to be dissenters, and to teach them unholy falsehoods in the name of a holy religion. Who would have thought that the opening years of the twentieth century after the advent of the Prince of Unsectarianism and Democracy would see the Government of the one nation in the world that has done most to provide for the freedom of its citizens attempting to deprive the people of their right to elected representatives both in Parliament and elsewhere on the all-important subject of the education of their children? Yet this is precisely what is happening to-day.—At the Committee meeting held this week, a very favourable report of the financial and general condition of the church was given for the past twelve months. Arrangements were made for a social, to be held on May 1, to which ministers and members of all the London Unitarian Churches will be invited to meet the Rev. R. H. and Mrs. Greaves. The church anniversary will be celebrated, as usual, on the first Sunday in May; and the Sunday-school anniversary is to be on the third Sunday in June. The membership has been increased by the addition of twenty new names since the beginning of January.

London: Stamford-street.—We are asked to direct attention to the advertisement announcing the annual meeting of the church, which is to be held on Thursday next. Mr. J. Harrison, President of the London and South-Eastern Provincial Assembly will preside, and friends of this church's benevolent work amongst the poor are earnestly invited.

Pepperhill.—The Rev. W. Harold Davies, of Pudsey, has given two excellent lectures at the above place. On Wednesday, March 26, his subject was "What is Unitarianism?" The chair was taken by Mr. J. H. Woodhead, of Shelf, and there were about sixty-five present. On April 2 he spoke on "The Trinity Unbiblical and Unreasonable." The chair was taken by Dr. Maclachlan, and the attendance numbered ninety-five. There were friends present from all denominations, discussion being invited at the close of each lecture. Mr. Davies has been heartily thanked for his kindness in coming to Pepperhill.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The parents' tea, in connection with the Sick and Savings Club, was held in the Channing Hall, on the invitation of the president, officers, and teachers of the Upper Chapel Sunday-school on April 2. About 160 sat down to tea, and there was a large attendance at the meeting and entertainment afterwards, at which the Rev. J. E. Manning presided. The amount paid into the club in 1901 was £121 1s. 6d., by 173 members. Mr. Ridge, assisted by Miss Wilson, acted as secretary, and Mr. Lister was treasurer. These officers of the club were heartily thanked for their services. The entertainment comprised songs by Miss Ward and Mr. Berry, a recitation by Miss Fox, and the children's play, Princess May and her Wonderful Law.

Stannington.—On March 30, Easter services were held here as usual, the preachers being the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., in the afternoon, and the Rev. Iden Payne in the evening. The congregations were very satisfactory, and the collections, which were up to the average, were on behalf of the choir, which was augmented for the occasion and assisted by a string band. On Easter Tuesday evening the Sunday-school children were given a tea in the schoolroom, after which about 120 teachers and friends also had tea. All then adjourned to the chapel for the public meeting, which was well attended, the place being well filled. Helpful addresses were delivered by the Chairman (the Rev. Iden Payne), and the Revs. J. E. Jenkins, J. E. Manning, M.A., and J. Lee, the congregational minister of Loxley. The speaking was interspersed with the singing of hymns and recitations by the children, who, under the tuition and conductorship of Mr. G. Vickers, the organist, again acquitted themselves splendidly. Mr. Vickers's place at the organ was taken by a Wesleyan friend, Mr. H. H. Dyson.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The school anniversary was held on April 6, and was marked with much success. The Rev. Henry Cross preached in the morning on "The Child and the School," and in the evening on "Young People and the Church." The afternoon service, presided over by Mr. Charles Bowes, was an experiment, and has proved the wisdom of it by its success. Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar, gave an excellent address, and presented prizes and certificates to the scholars for the past year's attendance and conduct. Special hymns and anthems were sung by the scholars at each of the services. We held our last monthly social for the present season on March 27. There was a large attendance and a very enjoyable evening was spent. Various table games were indulged in for some time, after which supper was served, and the evening's programme was concluded with a dramatic sketch, entitled The Pilfering Ghost. Our Band of Hope quarterly tea and social was held on April 2; nearly seventy sat down to tea, and after tea the young people enjoyed various games. The interest and numbers of the Band of Hope members still increase, and very satisfactory progress is being made in this branch of our work. We have formed a Cycling Club in connection with our Young People's Guild, and several cycling excursions of interest are being arranged for the season.

Torquay.—The last of the spring series of lectures was given on March 17, when Mr. S. S. Boase, of St. Marychurch, discoursed on "Gardening," in continuation of a previous lecture. The session was brought to a successful close by a concert, at which about 160 persons were present on Monday April 7. The chief items on the programme were Mendelssohn's "Serenade and Allegro Giojoso," for pianoforte and orchestra, and Greg's Sonato for pianoforte and violoncello, besides songs, duets, trios, &c. Several well-known musicians again kindly gave their services. The concert was arranged by Mr. C. T. Heaviside, the organist of the church; and the Rev. A. E. O'Connor presided at each meeting.

THE LAMPETER CHURCH.

The Unitarian movement at Lampeter has but a very short history. The first Church was opened in 1876 under the present ministry. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association voted £200 towards the building, and by the liberality of friends, far and near, the task was completed. Here, however, begins the plain but sad tale. The building, though neatly furnished and imposing in appearance, owing either to a sandy foundation or structural defects, soon showed signs of dilapidation, and had at last to be abandoned. It has now been pulled down, and the services are conducted in the School-room pending the building of a new Chapel.

The congregation, with its Sunday-school, is one of the largest on the roll of our Welsh Churches, and has attained an assured and honoured position in the town. Three of its sons are in the ministry, and three more are studying at different colleges with the same object.

Lampeter, in the centre of Cardiganshire, with its great Church of England College, its Lower Hall, where the Assizes, the Quarter Sessions, the County Council Meetings, are held, is a rapidly growing town ; and we feel it a duty incumbent upon us to make the new Church not only worthy of our own position, but also of the town in which it is situated. The building is estimated to cost from £1,700 to £2,000. Over £600 will be made locally. The congregation and minister, sorely grieved and crestfallen on account of the fate of their old Chapel, feel reluctant to appeal the second time to the generosity of the Unitarian public, but a re-constrained to do so in the interest of the Liberal Gospel, which they cannot at any cost renounce. This Appeal is made in confidence to old friends who helped us before, and new friends as well, all of whom cannot help being touched by the tale of sad misfortune which is the history of the first Church at Lampeter. Subscriptions will be thankfully received by the Minister, and acknowledged in the Christian Life and INQUIRER.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"THE spirit of monopoly is destroyed, and freedom, the chief element of commercial prosperity, is securely, and permanently, established." So THE INQUIRER wrote, July 4, 1846, proceeding to express gratitude to Providence, to the Ministry of Sir Robert Peel, and especially to "that glorious association of thoughtful, earnest, practical, hard-working men, who made the nation at large understand the question in all its bearings." Of course the reference is to the Anti-Corn-Law League, amongst the leaders of which were men whose sons and grandsons are with us to-day, leaders in many good works as well as in public and commercial life. It cannot but be interesting to them, at least, to have this note recalled in a week which opened with the announcement of a new Corn Law.

OUR friends at Nottingham have a voice in their midst that ought to stir them to energetic battle over the Education Bill. In the current High Pavement and Peas Hill Chronicle an editorial article recites the history of the undenominational schools formerly existing in the town, including those of High Pavement, which have been allowed to lapse on the understanding that the Board-schools had rendered them unnecessary. And now the worst disabilities imposed in Board-schools are to be far eclipsed by the new provisions sketched in the Bill. The writer of the article, having recalled the great names of some of the old-time champions of really unsectarian education says :—

The facts above are cited for our readers to help them to realise what a glorious heritage they repudiate if they fail to answer the call to them in this present crisis. This Education Bill is a dangerous measure from the point of view of English religious equality and freedom. High Pavement is a name that has stood for these principles for centuries. Will it to-day shirk its duty? A new compromise can only multiply the evils of the old one. Let these words sink into our hearts, and a resolve be made at any cost to vindicate to-day those principles of religious equality for which High Pavement has sacrificed so much for more than two centuries.

WE commend the example of our Nottingham ally in the fight. We see the Evangelical Free Church Council is fully alive to the duties of the hour as its members discern them. A great Conference, summoned with a speed which well marks the power of this new factor in national politics, met on Tuesday at St. James's Hall, and denounced the Government's proposals in the strongest terms. Are Unitarians to show themselves less keen on this subject than their evangelical brethren? This matter should be to no one a matter simply between Church and Chapel, least of all to us. We believe that light and discipline, hand in hand, are the best leaders of youth into an effective manhood. To those who would supply plenty of discipline but keep out the light of fullest truth and freedom of thought we oppose ourselves in the name, not of a sect, but of humanity.

BY the way, it so seldom falls to Unitarians to be complimented by the Standard that we rubbed our eyes after perusing a leading article in Wednesday's issue of that journal. Commenting on the violent language used at the St. James's Hall meeting by our Evangelical brethren, and observing that Mr. James Bryce at the Liberation Society's Breakfast "maintained a more decorous and rational tone," the Editor goes on to say :—"But it was reserved for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association sitting at Essex Hall—their pro-Cathedral in the Strand—to embody their views in a Resolution which can be read with respect even by those who cannot assent to its terms." Timeo Danaos, was our first thought; and we turned to the resolution (see p. 251) fearing it had been lacking in decision. But no, it was all right; our moderation ought, indeed, to be known of all men, but our opponents may be assured we feel no less for not saying more.

WE quote the following passages from the third volume of the Encyclopædia Biblica which is just issued, and which (we should remind the reader) is edited by the Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, Dr. Cheyne, who is, and no doubt will remain, Canon of Rochester. The article quoted is that on the "Nativity." The writer Professor Usener, of Bonn, says :—

Only Matthew and Luke deal with the birth and childhood of Jesus, and the two accounts are irreconcilably at variance. . . . Above all it was necessary that Jesus should be a descendant of David, and thus of Kingly origin. The genealogical lists which brought Joseph, the father of Jesus, into connection with David were the first literary consequence. However unobtrusive the prose in which they speak, they are nevertheless the earliest attempts of poetical invention regarding the birth of Christ. The next inevitable step was to transfer his cradle to Bethlehem. When the accounts of Matthew and Luke were written this had already become a fixed article of faith, which, well or ill, had somehow or other to be fitted in and reconciled with the historical fact as to his actual home. . . . Thus for the whole birth and childhood story of Matthew, in its every detail, it is possible to trace a pagan substratum. It must have arisen in Gentile-Christian circles . . . and then was to some extent legitimated by its narrator . . . by citation of prophetic "words" in its support. . . . The divine birth and nature of Christ thus became Gospel. . . .

There are twelve columns of closely printed matter in support of these conclusions; to which the reader may be referred. Nevertheless, in all churches as by law maintained in this land, and in all but a few of our schools, it will be confidently said to-morrow: "I believe . . . in Jesus Christ, His only Son, our Lord, Born of the Virgin Mary."

THE celebration at Boston of the eightieth birthday of the Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, April 3, appears to have been a triumphant success. In an age when so many of the big things go to the unscrupulous, selfish, and grasping, it is a great joy to see one man who by taking just the opposite track attains not only the silent love of multitudes, but on fit occasion their grateful homage and acclamation. We must defer till next week a full account of what was said to Dr. Hale and by him on this day of days. Stalwart Unitarian as he is, men of all sects and of none joined in the celebration. The President sent a message declaring that Americans are prouder of their citizenship because he is their fellow-citizen. And when the beautiful happy service of thanksgiving was over in Symphony Hall, and the pioneer-prophet of truth and brotherhood, whose motto is still "Look forward and not back," went home, he found a great purse had been put there for him by his admirers. So love of a man and reverence for true nobility found their voice and deed, that day.

What can be said to cure people, who occasionally occupy a brother's pulpit, of the habit of scoring pencil-marks through passages in his Bible? We seem to recollect a pathetic protest made on behalf of "the new Bible" by a venerable minister years ago; and now another minister tells us that the same "gross impertinence" has been perpetrated towards his pulpit copy. Want of thought, we should rather have described it; but still we have much sympathy with our friend's feeling of resentment. It is surely an unwarrantable liberty for a visitor to make marks of this kind. If he cannot remember which verses he wishes to omit, and cannot get over the difficulty by using, while he reads, a slip of paper as a memorandum, let him do as one minister known to us does, and write out the "lessons" for himself. Even such a culprit may thus in time learn some lessons of courtesy and respect for the property of others.

The following extract from a note written by Mrs. Dowson, of Nottingham, to the Rev. J. M. L. Thomas, expressing thanks for the service held in memory of the late Mr. Clayden, will be interesting to many:—

All that you said of him was very true. The sound of his voice in our beautiful service still rings in my ears; he had a strong personality, and in those days between 1860 and 1868, I am sure he seemed to "open heaven" for many of us. His thoughts were so beautiful, so inspiring, so fresh, and his language, voice, and manner all helped to carry them home to the heart. What a truly loveable man he was, with a good deal of the woman in him, which added to his charm; rather dependent on others, yet so bright, and good, and cheery in his loneliness. I think he was a singularly pure, simple, child-like character, leaving many tender memories and a sweet fragrance behind. And his hearty laugh, his boyish enthusiasm and eagerness, how delightful they were! It is good to think how many in Nottingham cherish a warm affection for his memory after these thirty-five years. I am sure many of his old friends would like to see a tablet in the church in his memory, and if you think that the publication of this letter in the next Chronicle would help to secure the adoption of this suggestion you are at liberty to use it.

Opinions differ, we hear, as to the precise nature of the memorial to be raised; but whether a window or a tablet perpetuate Mr. Clayden's memory for future generations, that memory will be a living influence in the hearts of the generation that knew him.

"Man's Power over the Lower Animals" is the subject dealt with by the Rev. Charles Hargrove in the April number of the Mill Hill Pulpit. (To be had of Mr. C. Stainer, 82, Ravenswood-terrace, Hyde Park, Leeds, by post 1½d.). Having pictured the dominion of man over all other creatures, and the testimony of modern science, confirming the old scriptural conception, as to the natural kinship between man and all other living creatures, the sermon takes up the difficult question of cruelty. Referring to the arguments used recently in the House of Lords against the Bishop of Hereford's Bill for the prevention of cruelty to wild animals, Mr. Hargrove points out that they were identical with those used just a hundred years ago against a measure to put a stop to bull-baiting, and expresses the hope that in another hundred years "a more refined and sensitive generation will marvel at the brutalities of which our day approves." Cruelty Mr. Hargrove defines as pain inflicted "upon any thing living, man or beast, without having in view an end proportionate to the amount." But surely something more is needed to justify an end than such an attempt to estimate the "proportionate" amount of pain that may be allowed; and when Mr. Hargrove says, "serious suffering can be justified only by very grave reasons for its infliction," we should add, provided also that there are not even graver reasons which forbid its infliction.

From such general considerations Mr. Hargrove passes to grapple with the crucial question of vivisection, and, disclaiming any right to lay down the law on the question whether it is ever lawful to inflict pain on the lower animals by way of experiment, states first of all these two conclusions, which he takes to be more or less generally accepted by humane people:—

First.—Restraint must be put upon all experiments involving real pain. It is useless to plead the recognised humanity of the medical profession and of men of science. They are of the same passions as other men, and as liable to become hardened by the spectacle of suffering, or to be too engrossed in eager pursuit of knowledge to pay attention to it. It is not because these men are worse than any of ourselves, but because they are just the same as we are, that we impose upon them the restraint without which it is unsafe to entrust any class—lawyers, teachers, parents, ministers most of all—with power over their fellow-creatures. This the law of England now recognises; how far the law is carried out it is not for me to say.

Secondly.—It is not lawful to inflict severe pain, merely by way of experiment, or for the exercise of skill, or in the indefinite pursuit of knowledge—as e.g., to discover how an animal dies of starvation, or suffocation, or excessive cold or heat, or what is the effect of various degrees of pain upon the heart or lungs. The registration of such facts may be interesting, but their possible utility cannot justify the torture of our fellow-creatures, our kith and kin, as Science and Religion alike teach that they are. That such things have been done, and are done by respectable men of science, is to the shame of our common humanity, and cannot be too emphatically condemned.

When, however, Mr. Hargrove comes to state a third and final conclusion, going to the very heart of this question of vivisection, we find ourselves obliged emphatically to dissent, and cannot admit that it is in any degree fairly set down as generally accepted among humane people. This third conclusion Mr. Hargrove states in the following words:—

I assert, with all deference to good men and women who do not agree with me, that it is lawful to inflict even severe pain upon an animal with the object of discovering the cause of disease in man, and with reasonable expectation of finding the means of prevention or of cure.

But such an admission, as it seems to us, opens the door to the unlimited torture of sensitive creatures, for who is to set any bound to the scientific experimenter's "reasonable expectation"? And the past history of vivisection seems to forbid any solace in the thought that we may "perform painful operations on a very few [animals] with the reasonable hope of obtaining knowledge which will give us the mastery of disease."

Mr. Hargrove, at the end of his sermon, quotes Archdeacon Wilberforce, but the Archdeacon, if we mistake not, would allow him short shrift for the argument that because he would submit his child to a painful operation to save it from blindness, therefore he would do the same to a dog for his child's sake. The argument, of course, to be worth anything, must go much further, and must mean that he would submit numbers of dogs and other highly sensitive creatures to long-continued and intense suffering, amounting to torture, in the hope of finding means to save his child. The retort is familiar, that we might even consent, if we had the power, to submit Mr. Hargrove himself to such experiment, for the sake of one yet more dear; but the real question is, Would it be right? Mr. Hargrove appears to take it for granted that because we accept the germ theory of the origin of disease we are justified in inoculating animals with cancer and other dreadful diseases, in order to study their origin and progress, and very naturally passes from that assumption to justify what is more strictly termed vivisection. We find it impossible to admit that either method of investigation is permissible to a humane man. From the mutilation, enslavement and slaughter of animals in countless numbers for human uses, Mr. Hargrove passes to justify restricted vivisection. But even if restriction could be made a reality, the pleading of a higher moral ideal seems to us to point in a different direction. Any of those other practices, when they amount to torture, are evil and forbidden to a true humanity; and if we still must slaughter animals (as of course we must) in self-defence and for food, it must be our most strenuous endeavour to see that it is done with the infliction of the least possible amount of pain. And we cannot feel it just to claim, from our position of dominance over other animals, the right to increase immeasurably their sufferings for our supposed benefit, by the methods of scientific investigation and propagation of disease, commonly classed under the general term of vivisection. We do not argue here whether the methods of vivisection have really been of service to science or not, and whether they may not have turned men aside from more fruitful and more wholesome paths of research; we simply affirm our conviction that we must have more patience and be content to bear our own pains, until we can find a better way of deliverance.

Humane Review, Mind,

GLIMPSES OF EASTERTIDE IN FRANCE.

On Easter Sunday, a year ago, it was my privilege to be one of five thousand people gathered for worship in the Cathedral of the ancient city of Tours. The churches, on all hands, were crowded; at some of them hundreds could not get in, and in all alike the same note prevailed. It was joy—joy everywhere! Flowers and music were the fitting emblems — loveliest flowers with their freshness, their fragance, their colours; and grandest, sweetest music with its rousing, thrilling, then soothing and calming power. These were in abundance, and of the best. And yet to me there was something even better than music and flowers within that mighty cathedral. There was evidently the human soul at worship. There is nothing greater anywhere than the human soul, forgetting self, looking upward to a Higher, reaching out for it, and rejoicing in it. Something of this highest, one saw and felt in those five thousand people within Tours Cathedral on Easter Sunday morning. Not in all, of course. Among five thousand people there must be great varieties of feeling, and innumerable shades of spiritual susceptibility. There seemed to be every class there—and about as many men as women. The very large majority were well-dressed, and many of them evidently very well off. Even the obviously poor were neat and cleanly on that day. Many, it was clear, were in new clothes. As if to emphasise the general cleanliness by contrast, I saw two poor lads standing at the back who literally did not seem to have been washed that year. They were certainly the two dirtiest-faced human beings I have ever seen in my life. They were so dark-skinned with the dirt, that at first I took them for Arabs. However, it takes all kinds of people to make a world or a congregation, and if these had not been there something would have been lacking. And as the sunlight streamed through the many-coloured windows; as the magnificent organ pealed forth the glorious march to which the long procession of white and purple and red and golden-robed choir, priests and bishops entered the chancel; as, by-and-by, the music of the organ, rolling like a tide from west to east, reverberating along the pillared aisles, softened and varied as it moved about the arches of the vaulted roof; as, at length, its mellowed echoes died away, and from the chancel an orchestra of violins broke softly upon us and accompanied the great choir of boys and men who sang, in wondrous strains, the glad Easter music—one boy's voice, now and then, in solo, like a bird nearing the sky, rising rich and clear—the fluted clarionet and the fine 'cellos in harmony with the exquisite touch of the trembling violins, and the up-swelling and rejoicing chorus of human voices fit for heaven: as one saw and heard all this, felt the rapt stillness throughout that great Cathedral, looked at the faces of that listening multitude, the fact was borne in upon us that here the human soul was indeed worshipping—worshipping not in tears of sorrow but in the sunshine of Easter joy.

On Palm Sunday we had been at St. Jean de Luz, an old, charming, and busy French seaside town on the borders of Spain. The window of my bedroom looked out upon what was practically the Cathedral of the town—the great and historic church of St. Jean, where Louis XIV., King of France, was married to a Princess Teresa of Spain. At five o'clock on Palm Sunday morning the bell rang out for service, and busy feet in scores and hundreds hurried past my window. At six, at seven, and at every hour on to eleven that morning the bell rang, and busy feet wended churchwards. Here in the street came processions of school-children and countless men and women hurrying to church, nearly all carrying branches of green bay tree, which served as palms. These palms were all going into the church to be blessed at a special service, and so soon as the service was over those who had palms hastened out to hang the sweet-smelling branch of bay-leaf up in their homes.

All through Passion Week, every day, services of various kinds went on. Not that the French people neglected their daily work much; they are too thrifty and industrious for that. But then they seem quite used to slipping out of the market, for instance, into the church on a weekday, and, after a twenty minutes' service or a few minutes to themselves, going right back to work again.

On the Thursday before Good Friday I was in the historic town of Poitiers. It seemed to be a holiday. The churches were busy and full—streams of people, old and young, going in and out. Here one was struck, on this particular day, with the peculiar but attractive white cap which nearly every woman, aged or youthful, appeared to wear.

The prettiest sight, however, on this day to me was in the Cathedral in the afternoon. A special service for the blessing of the bread to be given away was held in the middle of the great nave. The Bishop reminded me of the late Bishop Frazer, of Manchester. A procession of priests preceded him as he entered in his purple robe. That afternoon, besides many grown-up people, there were many boys and girls and little children in the Cathedral, and as the benevolent and energetic looking old Bishop passed along the aisle on both sides of which people stood, many bent for his blessing, and on both sides he held his hands and blessed as he passed. But now and again he paused to specially bless. Whom? I wondered until I watched more closely, and then I saw that it was little children. It was a lovely sight. And here and there it was a bigger boy or girl. One boy, standing alone as it happened, was fortunate enough to have the Bishop's special blessing, and, if I may judge from the celestial look on that boy's face for the moment, he will never forget it as long as he lives.

These are mere glimpses of what we saw in Passion Week and on Easter Sunday looking at France on the religious side. But may I venture, in conclusion, upon one reflection? In all these services there was no appeal to the understanding. The appeal was all to the emotions; and as emotion is more easily reached than is the understanding, the appeal was more effective. But man is not all emotion, as man is not all understanding; and to emphasise either, to the neglect of the other, is surely an injury to our nature. We Unitarians have laid stress upon the understanding. Roman Catholicism, at the opposite extreme, has laid stress upon the emotions. They are both right as far as they go, and we have only to study the histories of both, and consider the circumstances in which they have been evolved, to see that it was natural that Roman Catholicism should accentuate the emotional, and that Unitarianism should as naturally appeal to the reason. This was the utmost that either of them could do for the time being. Then, so conservative is ordinary human nature that Roman Catholicism has been afraid of the rational part of man, and Unitarianism has been almost as afraid of the emotional and æsthetic part of man. If I had to make my choice as to whether I would live by the merely emotional or the merely rational, I should decidedly choose to live by reason. But God has not doomed us to any such choice. We can have all that we can use of either, and we are beginning to see that not by reason alone, any more than by emotion alone, is man helped to worship God and live the good life. Imagine what our Unitarianism might be to us and others if, bating not one jot of its clear-headed appeal to the understanding, it could also, by the power and beauty of its ordered services, appeal to our hearts as that service appealed to those five thousand people on Easter morning in Tours Cathedral. Can anyone tell what such blended power of mind and feeling might do?

J. J. Wright.

MATTHEW HENRY AND JAMES MARTINEAU.

The association of these two names has been a matter of concern to many minds. Some have wondered at what they call the incongruity; they seem to resent the coupling as a slight on the true gospel; and they are certain that the juxtaposition of figures on the stained-glass in Matthew Henry's Chapel is due to nothing less than historical perversity. That this feeling is genuine on their part is clear from the surprise of one denominational paper, which tells its readers, confidentially, that the unexpected has happened, and these Unitarians have actually put in a window to Matthew Henry's honour. Men have thought the differences in belief so great that the incompatibility could only be resolved by one of the vagaries of that wandering people.

In general, the reviewers have reminded me of the Captain of the host of Syria, who was counted quite a respectable and even worthy character—but he was a leper. The book, "Matthew Henry and his Chapel," is right enough in its way—but it is a Unitarian way. And yet the history of the chapel fully satisfies the dictum of Mr. Balfour, that "for a change to be durable, it must be continuous."

James Martineau was proud to acknowledge himself in the line of spiritual descent from such as Matthew Henry, and those whom he also honoured. We have a vivid picture of the eager young student visiting Richard Baxter—the Baxter who then was not only "outed," but silenced and persecuted, of whom Martineau says:—"He rested liberty of conscience on the plea, not of the common helplessness of men which left them without an arbiter, but on a common moral nature and spiritual unity which might leave them in identical relations with God, amid great varieties of judgment with each other. By thus shifting the conditions of harmony with God from the understanding to the affections, he opened the only way of binding the deepest pieties and the sweetest charities together."

Should any think this to be poetry and not history, let us bring Henry to testify :—"By all this it is evident that unity of affection is the thing to be laboured after, and not uniformity in mode and ceremonies."

Martineau continues:—"He (Baxter) gave a new expansion to the powers of thought by flinging off the fear lest a fallacy in logic should bring ruin to the soul, and by seeing in every dawning of reasonable doubt a call of sacred duty instead of a seduction of diabolical temptation ; and so recalling all the suspicious sentinels that had been posted at every entrance to the human mind he relieved it from compression, and sent it, not with permission only, but with the divine benediction, on its own full course to read the meaning of things on earth and things in heaven. . . In conformity with this principle, the English Presbyterians from Baxter's time persistently constituted their religious societies without theological tests. It was the same with their academies, to which I now revert. Thus, Richard Frankland, Calvinist as he was in his convictions and in his teaching, trusted his truth to its own inherent power, and asked no pledges from his pupils. . . From Warrington Academy . . . to the present hour the fundamental principle of Baxterian Catholicity has been maintained:—All knowledge good ; all conscience free ; no restrictions to be put on either under the plea of religion, or for the sake of a superfluous uniformity of theological conception."

Of Frankland, Principal Gordon has said:—"Frankland was a Presbyterian. . . . He claimed for all who went to him the liberty of a broad platform. . . . He took his stand, a free man, holding strong views, and bringing up a generation of free men as strong thinkers."

It is noteworthy that a son-in-law and a nephew of Matthew Henry, both members of the Chester Chapel, served on the first committee, and that some of the later worthies of the congregation were alumni of the Warrington Academy which James Martineau ranked as pioneer to that which possessed him, as student, professor, and principal.

There are Unitarians of our own day who would say that Martineau read back too much of his own spirit into the Presbyterians of two centuries gone. But what other spirit can it be than that of Matthew Henry's "Christianity no Sect," his praise of his friend Dr. Benion—the Principal of an Academy—that "his aim was to make them men of sense and Catholic Christians," and the confession : "How hard it is that when on the one side such noble, beneficial and heavenly principles of love and moderation, and particularly a candid temper towards the Church of England, are in the academies of the Dissenters so studiously infused and encouraged, there should be on the other side such pains taken, and all the arts of misrepresentation used, to render the Dissenters contemptible and odious, and men not fit to be tolerated. But let us not be weary of rendering good for evil thus ; for in due time we shall reap, if we faint not."

And truly we have reaped somewhat.

James Martineau, not allowed to enter a national university without doctrinal tests, received an honorary degree from the very University of Oxford which Matthew Henry would have entered but for his father's and his own dislike to those binding dogmatic subscriptions.

The "unsectarian" spirit of these Presbyterian divines is well illustrated by Matthew Henry's words :—"And here let me premise (and yet I hope we are in this matter so manifest in your consciences that I need not mention it) that we abhor the thought of drawing into the character of a good minister his being in everything of our mind. Far be it, far be it from us to monopolise Christianity or the ministry, and confine either within the pale of our own particular opinion in things that concern not the vitals and essentials of religion. We are not here seeking to advance the reputation of a party, nor appropriating the good character to those of our own denomination. . . . No, we take all occasion to protest against it, and while we walk according to what we have attained, endeavouring therein to approve ourselves to God in our own integrity, we charitably believe that others do so too, and . . . we heartily love and honour all good men and good ministers, however in the less weighty matters of the law we differ from them in sentiment and apprehension, and practise accordingly ; and we highly value all who cast out devils in Christ's name, though they follow not with us."

The famous commentator was a Dissenter for that very reason—"to join with those whose constitution leaves room for a catholic and comprehensive charity."

In the evolution of this divine charity he who died on June 22, 1714, was a worthy forerunner to him who was born on April 21, 1805. He tells his hearers in "Disputes Reviewed":—"There are disputes that are of use among the disciples of Christ, and which in the review we may reflect upon with comfort. Did we dispute for the conviction of Atheists and Deists and other enemies of our holy religion ; did we fairly and calmly discuss lesser matters in difference between us and our brethren, that we might find out the truth and have our mistakes rectified ; or if we cannot hereby come to be of the same mind, yet we may see that even those we differ from have so much colour of reason on their side as that they may still differ from us, and yet not forfeit their reputation either for wisdom and honesty. Parties may be served by fury and violence, but the common interests of pure Christianity will certainly be prejudiced by it."

The theory was not neglected in practice: "And this has been the judgment," says Mr. Henry, "of the congregation at Chester, between whom and their ministers there have never been those solemn mutual engagements that have been between some other ministers and their congregations, nor any bond but that of love."

James Martineau found in such words his own heart's desire, and joyfully sent a donation to the Restoration Fund of Matthew Henry's Chapel.

To-day, as the two men stand faithfully portrayed on either side of the old pulpit, we may link them in (1) their appeal to reason, (2) their spiritual interpretation of the universe, (3) their plea—the pathetic plea for religious comprehension ; and may we not add (4) their consequent principle of non-subscribing Churches?

FLOWERS IN PALESTINE.

Last year I saw the spring flowers bloom under Syrian skies. They were more brilliant and perhaps more abundant than those which are native to English fields and woodlands ; yet the first celandine and primrose seen this year in my own country have appeared no less beautiful than of old. The greater glory of other lands does not in any wise dim the loveliness of one's own. In truth the coming on of spring this year, at home, has seemed the more delightful through having missed it once, travelling amid strange and unfamiliar scenes.

We were too late to see it come in Palestine ; it was there in all its strength and fulness of life when, quite early in March, we began our pilgrimage northwards through the Judæan hills. The crocus and the sweet-scented narcissus—one of which was probably the "Rose of Sharon"—were already past. But most of the more brightly coloured flowers were in full bloom ; and, looking over my poor dried specimens, gathered by the wayside or about the camp at evening, the memory of those strange places where they grew revives, and I see again many a wild and barren scene made by their presence pleasing and beautiful. No words could tell what sweet refreshment they have brought to the spirit on many a weary journey, and at the close of many a sultry day, or in the early morning when the dew was still upon their leaves. The glow of colour, the grace of form, the cheerfulness of their fresh, glad life in lonely, desolate places—the recollection of this comes back like a dream of beauty and delight that perhaps will never quite pass away.

In the early days of our pilgrimage, following the uneven, stony track that winds through the hill country of Judæa and Samaria, one flower especially claimed the traveller's interest and admiration. The cyclamen abounds, I suppose, in every English greenhouse, sheltered and carefully tended there. But in Palestine it grows on the open hillside and among barren rocks, unprotected from the storm and often with bare sufficiency of soil in which to strike its roots. I had no conception of the beauty of this flower till I saw it clinging to those bare crags, its glossy leaves and purplish stem and richly tinted petals so bright and graceful against the grey limestone. I remember one great rock adorned with these, seen as we were journeying from Bethel to Shiloh. It stood out from the hillside close to our path, presenting a broad, flat, almost perpendicular surface to the eye ; and across it was one long, irregular fissure, as if the rock had been split in two in falling from the hill above. Along this crevice the cyclamen had taken root and blossomed ; the dark green leaves lay against the grey stone, and the gracefully curved stems hung over, poising their bright flowers in the soft warm sunshine—making thus a festoon of surpassing loveliness from one side to the other of the huge barren rock. The ride that day was long and wearisome through the close, shadeless valley. But the vision of that waved line of delicate forms and brilliant colours across the hard bare rock was a strange and sweet refreshment to the spirit.

Some days later we were coming down from the high hills of Safed to the wide plain of the Upper Jordan Valley.

A halt was called for a few minutes on a slope of dry stony land, which once, apparently, had been a cultivated field. On either side the bare hills rose, and all the ground was parched and barren and drear. But peering about among the dry clods and stones I discovered one of the smallest and most perfectly beautiful flowers it has been my lot to gather. It was a species of veronica, somewhat like our germander speedwell, but much smaller and of more intense colour. Three of its petals were of the deepest, richest blue; the fourth was of pure white; and a line of white edged the two lower blue petals where they touched the white one. In the centre was one bright star of orange where the stamens nestled. The entire plant—root, stem and flower—was scarcely more than two inches long; but the wealth of loveliness which that tiny creature offered to the eye was truly a miracle of wonder and delight. Standing there in the barren field, among those wild hills, under that Syrian sky; holding this little flower in my hand, was an experience which it would be vain and useless to try to express in any written words. Yet, perhaps, simply to tell of some homely incident such as this may suggest more than any attempt to describe the luxuriousness and variety of floral life in that far-off land.

The deep blue of my little speedwell reminds me of the striking effect of a large blue flower that grows abundantly in the Plain of Jezreel. Descending one morning from the Samaritan hills, on our way to Nazareth, we saw, in this fertile, low-lying plain, many broad patches of bright blue, and found them to be composed of the tall handsome lupine. The soil of the Jezreel Valley is of a deep red colour; the cultivated fields were then green with the young corn, and the presence of these wild luxuriant blue flowers was singularly beautiful and effective there. One thought of the masses of wild hyacinth or bluebell that give such colour to the English landscape in spring. But these grow in the woodlands or shady dells, while the lupine of the East loves the broad open plain.

It is said that in the hill country of Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee red is the prevailing colour among flowers. And truly it is abundant and often very striking. From the delicate rose-pink of the cyclamen to the bright scarlet of the anemone and the deep crimson of the pomegranate flower there is a great variety and wealth of this glowing colour. The scarlet buttercup and the blood-red passion-everlasting I did not find. But the beautiful little pheasant's eye and our own common poppy of the cornfields and the scarlet anemone were continually greeting us. This last is the flower which the word translated "lily" in the great saying of Jesus is generally supposed to mean. No one knows. But it is certainly very abundant about the hills and fields of Nazareth. I have seen this flower (Anemone coronaria) in more shades of colour than any other flower in Palestine: almost pure white—though this was very rare; several shades of blue and purple; oftenest a deep, rich, glowing red, and this may go well with the saying, "that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these."

To attempt to tell of the flowers of the Jordan Valley as we saw them one day when riding across the whole breadth of the Ghôr, from Fahil (the ancient Pella) on the east, to Beisan on the west, would be a hopeless task. In the channels of the Wadys that flow down from the eastern hills the oleander was in radiant bloom, its rose-red tufts of flower glowing among the paleish green lanceolate leaves; and beside these grew tall sedges and yet taller reeds ("shaken with the wind"), some of which I should have said to be the papyrus reed, did not the authorities declare that this is now extinct except in two places further north. On the open plain poppies very large and bright, yellow marigolds, the Madonna flower (a lovely creature which also abounds in the neighbourhood of Nazareth, and is named after Mary), a beautiful pale yellow scabious, thistles with rich purple heads and long awns of the same colour, pale pink and sometimes white hollyhocks, a tall, upright, finely branched rose-pink mallow—the mingling of the colours and forms of all these, with many more, of which only the dim memory of abounding luxuriant plant life remains, gave the traveller a glimpse of what nature can do once every year in that low hot plain. Nearer the river the flowers gave way to dense growths of thorny shrub, and then the luxuriant feathery tamarisk, some of it in flower, with catkins a little like our willow; and then the Jordan itself, a deep, broad, yellowish brown stream, flowing as of old when men from the far Euphrates saw it, crossed it, and changed the history of the world.

I think, of all the flowers that gave us pleasure in that strange country, the one that moved me most was a common English daisy found one day at evening near the camp. Just an ordinary "wee modest, crimson-tipped flower" (though that was a Scotch daisy!); but it was home, and friends, and love, and hope. I blessed it where it grew, and left it growing.

LITERATURE.

MODERN THOUGHT IN INDIA.*

We have received some publications representing various lines of enlightened Indian thinking, which are well deserving of attention.

Professor M. C. Sen's interesting and well-written little work is the outcome of notes dictated to students who have in view the B.A. Examination in Philosophy in Calcutta University. It is a student's text-book, first of all, and hence its outward arrangement is not specially attractive to "the general reader." But it is a clearly-conceived and instructive presentation of theoretical problems of ethics as they shape themselves at the present time. The author's general point of view is that of "Idealism" as represented in the works of Green, Dewey, Muirhead, Mackenzie, and D'Arcy—a point of view which may be described as in the main "Hegelian," but—in Professor Sen's case—modified by the influence of Professor James Seth's "Study of Ethical Principles," and Dr. Martineau's "Types of Ethical Theory." The modifications are, in our opinion, improvements, particularly in the treatment of Moral Freedom, Moral Obligation, and the Moral Ideal. The meaning of moral freedom is explained as Kant explained it in the pregnant saying, "Ought implies can." The author does not engage in the vain endeavour to combine the ethical advantages of Libertarianism and the scientific advantages of Determinism in one theory. In the statement of the ground of moral obligation, again, he does not attempt to identify the divine source of obligation with the human self. With Newman and Martineau, he says that "the voice of conscience is the voice of God"; but, differing from them, he proceeds:—

> In order to understand this doctrine rightly, we must inquire why does God lay His commands upon us. Are the moral laws so many arbitrary decrees? Can we say that God, if He wills, by an ukase, can turn infidelity into a virtue and fidelity into a vice? The answers to these questions must be in the negative. The moral law cannot rest on the arbitrary exercise of a power, however great. A rational law, apprehended by the reason as just and proper, has an intrinsic and immutable excellence. It is the intrinsic and immutable excellence of the end which necessarily creates obligation on our part to realise it. Fidelity, for example, is commanded because it is good; it is not good because it is commanded. God might have refrained from creating human beings with appointed ends, but having created them, it is His Reason which discloses to them the eternal distinctions of good and evil as they were comprehended within it. We are the participators in His Reason, and it is this fact which enables us to rise above the thousand imperfections of our nature and grasp the Ideal in its universality.

Thus moral laws derive their authority from the fact that they are rationally dependent on a divinely appointed end or Ideal of personality, which is realised by obeying them. Finally, as regards this Ideal, the author is not content (with the Hegelian moralists) to describe it only as "social" and "rational":—

> "It is in the harmonious realisation of our entire self (viewed as no less sentient than rational, as no less social than individual) that the highest good consists. By self-realisation is meant the realisation of every excellence that man has it in him to attain. This demands the control of all ignoble inclinations; sensibility [bodily and other impulses and feelings] is indeed a necessary factor of moral life, but its place is subordinate to that of the Reason which reveals the Law as absolutely imperative. Each selfish impulse (and all impulses, even the benevolent, are selfish in the sense that each seeks its own and disregards all other claims) must be denied or brought under the law of life of the total rational self." Hence "no natural inclination has to be expunged; each has its appointed place in the economy of life."
> "Let us not always say
> 'Spite of this flesh to-day
> I strove, made head, gained ground upon the whole.'
> As the bird wings and sings,
> Let us cry 'All good things
> Are ours; nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul!'"

Professor B. N. Sen is secretary of the Brahmo Somaj Committee, which selects candidates for the Manchester College Scholarship. The first of the two spirited pamphlets mentioned below contains three lectures on the Vedanta philosophy, each of which is instructive and full of suggestiveness. The lecture on "Student Life and the Stage" deals with a question of applied ethics with sincerity and candour, but his conclusion is not a hopeful one. In part this results from the author's lofty ideal of what dramatic art should be; for, in the manner of Plato, he condemns all forms of the drama as it actually is, because all fall short of the ideal. But when we meet with the statement that the modern stage, as it is, is "deadly poison" to all that is best and noblest in the rising national life—we can only infer either that the level of the Calcutta theatres is very low, or that the author's judgment has given way to some strong prejudice. This pamphlet is altogether "oriental" in tone and tendency; and we scarcely think that the ethical theory of Professor M. C. Sen—who writes entirely under the influence of European thinkers—would warrant so extreme a conclusion.

THE TARGUMS AGAIN.

Under the title "The Transition from Hebrew to Aramaic," * Mr. Manning has now printed an appendix of twenty-two pages to his address on the Targums. He here argues that already by the time of Nehemiah Aramaic had become the language of Jerusalem, but that, nevertheless, side by side with the Aramaic, Hebrew retained sufficient vitality to produce Chronicles, Esther, Ecclesiastes and Daniel. In other words, he maintains that though Hebrew was still the literary language down to Maccabean times, it was nevertheless dead enough nearly three centuries earlier to necessitate the production of Aramaic translations of the sacred writings. We think it would have been more judicious of Mr. Manning either to abandon his revival of the traditional date for the Targums, or else to reject the critical date for Chronicles, Daniel, &c., as more of the vagaries of modern destructive criticism. The argument of this appendix is unfortunately vitiated by a misconception as to the nature and distribution of the Aramaic language. Mr. Manning lumps together Syrians, Assyrians, and Babylonians as Aramaeans, describes the conquests of the Assyrian kings and of Nebuchadrezzar as Aramaic conquests, represents Aramaic as the native language of Babylonia, and conjures up a picture of the exiles, impressed by the wealth and activity of Babylon, compelled to speak the language of their captors by the very necessities of daily life. It so happens that the cuneiform inscriptions are not in Aramaic.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

The fifty-second annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday evening. There was a good attendance of subscribers and supporters. After an hour of social intercourse the chair was taken by the President, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., who was supported on the platform by the Revs. A. Shaen Solly, W. G. Tarrant, A. Webster, F. H. Stanley, R. H. Greaves and J. E. Stronge, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., and Messrs. F. Withall, T. H. Terry, G. Harold Clennell and J. Coltart.

The report was read by the Secretary, and stated that plans for extended work had been considered, the means for extension having been provided in a bequest of £2,000 from the late Miss J. Durning Smith. The Committee recommend the appointment of a missionary minister and agent to open up new districts, and the continued fostering of young churches already founded. The condition of the grant-aided congregations is considered to be more or less hopeful in every case. The list includes Forest Gate, Kilburn, Lewisham, Mansford-street, Plumstead, Stepney, Limehouse, and Wood Green. The financial statement shows receipts of £1,100 (exclusive of the bequest mentioned above), and there was a small balance in hand at end of 1901.

Mr T. H. Terry, the treasurer, in giving his report, said that while there was a balance of £25 in hand at the end of the year, he was not quite satisfied with the financial condition of the Society. The ordinary expenditure was in excess of the annual income, the surplus of the past year being due to a special appeal which had been made to pay off the accumulated deficiencies of previous years. He would like to see a larger subscription list, and that the support accorded the Society was worthy our London churches.

The President, in moving the adoption of the reports, called attention to a few points mentioned in them. He hoped the appeal of the Forest Gate congregation for funds to make their hall bright and more comfortable, and more useful for their meetings, would be generously responded to and encouraged. At Lewisham, he was pleased to know that the congregations were so large they were now compelled to face the question of better accommodation. He thought the new work projected by the Society of appointing a missionary minister to carry our gospel into new districts and do all he could to establish new centres of worship, was very much needed, and that the legacy of the late Miss Durning Smith would, he was sure, be expended in accordance with her desires in carrying out such a scheme of missionary enterprise.

The Rev. F. Stanley, in a few words expressing his pleasure at the proposed appointment of a missionary minister, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

On the motion of Mr. F. Withall, seconded by Mr. S. S. Tayler, Rule V. of the Constitution was rescinded, and the following substituted :—

That Rule V. of the Society's rules be rescinded and the following rule adopted in its place—namely, "That at the annual meeting there should be appointed a President, Vice-President, a Treasurer and Secretaries, and a Committee of twenty. That the Treasurer and Secretaries for that year, and the President of the preceding year, shall be by virtue of their office a part of every Committee."

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant moved that Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart, M.P., be elected President for the ensuing year. This was seconded by Mr. Chancellor, and carried unanimously.

Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence on rising was cordially received, and said it gave him great pleasure to become President of that Society. It had been founded by his brother, and his father had been its first president. It had taken frankly the Unitarian name, and he conceived it to be his duty to make a stand for Unitarianism, and during his term of office he would do what he could for the welfare of that Society and the good of the cause they all had at heart.

On the motion of Mr. Ion Pritchard, seconded by the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, the Vice-Presidents and other officers were appointed, the treasurer and secretaries being re-elected.

Mr. H. Chatfeild-Clarke moved, and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards seconded, the election of the Committee with the Rev. W. G. Tarrant as Chairman. This was voted unanimously.

The Rev. R. H. Greaves then read a paper on "The Work of our Denomination in America." His opening remarks emphasised the numerical insignificance of the body, there being over 400 churches of other denominations to one of the Unitarians. If judged according to geographical area they averaged about eight to an area equal to that of the British Isles. Nevertheless, their influence was very extensive, and the activity of the American Unitarian Association was never greater than now, when the Rev. Dr. S. A. Eliot, son of the President of Harvard, is secretary. Mr. Greaves detailed the work of the Association, which includes, besides individual subscribers, a large number of representatives of the churches. More than half the Unitarian churches in the United States owe their existence to this Association. It has a Church Building Loan Fund with a capital of about £30,000. Referring to the National Conference, the following statement was made by Dr. Eliot at the Conference in 1899 :—"This Conference is a deliberative body. Your Association is an executive body. It is the function of the Conference to debate and advise. It is the function of the Association to apply. It is the province of the Conference to discuss those problems of theology, education, and philanthropy, in which are involved the welfare of the Church and State. It is the province of the Association to turn acquisition into accomplishment, to transform knowledge into power, and to make aspiration culminate in will. The attitude of the Conference is receptive, of the Association aggressive. The one has to do primarily with the world within, the other with the world without. In our Conference we are willing disciples. In our Association we must be ardent apostles." Other organisations referred to by Mr. Greaves included the District Conferences, Women's Alliance, Sunday-school Society, and Young People's Religious Union. He believed the body was more active than ever in missionary work. The latter part of his paper referred to the "leaven" of Unitarianism which was admitted to be pervading the life of the whole community. Dr. De Costa, a virulent seceder to Romanism, had, with a fine confusion of metaphors, asserted that Unitarianism is in America "the leaven that is poisoning the roots of things," and "is far on the way of making a stump of the episcopal body" in the State of Massachusetts. Finally, Mr. Greaves believed that the time of "pale negations" had passed, and a positive faith, full of hope for the world and mankind, now manifested itself in the Unitarian propaganda of America.

A vote of thanks to the reader of the Paper was moved by the Rev. H. S. SOLLY (Bridport), and seconded by the Rev. A. WEBSTER (Aberdeen); and a similar compliment to the chairman concluded the business.

OBITUARY.

MR. WILLIAM GIMBLETTE.

MR. WILLIAM GIMBLETTE, who was for a number of years employed in a responsible position at Tobias Bros., Coolgardie, died on Saturday, Feb. 1, as notified per cable and advertised in our columns at the time. We now have the following particulars from the Coolgardie Miner:—

Mr. Gimblette had been a resident of Coolgardie for about eight years, and was very well and favourably known all over the fields. He had been suffering from that dreadful disease, consumption, for a considerable time past, and its ravages compelled him to take to his bed during the last ten or eleven months, in the course of which, on a number of occasions, his decease was considered to be only a matter of hours. Mr. Gimblette was only thirty-nine years of age at the time of his death, and leaves a wife and two children.

The deceased was accorded a Masonic funeral, having been a member of the Coolgardie Lodge of Freemasons, and shortly before his demise expressed a wish that his Masonic brethren would perform the rites peculiar to the craft at his burial. A "Lodge of Sorrows" was opened at the Masonic Hall, Lindsay-street, in the presence of a large gathering of the craft.

Worshipful Master J. Williams (Coolgardie Lodge) conducted the service, after which the brethren headed the funeral cortège to the cemetery, where the last rites to the deceased brother were impressively carried out.

The members of the Coolgardie Liedertafel, of which the deceased had also been a member, attended the funeral and sang at the graveside Sullivan's "The Long Day Closes," and the hymns "Nearer My God to Thee," and "Abide with Me," the latter by the special request of the deceased, who, just before he died, marked it in his hymn-book with the request that it should be sung over his grave. The Rev. Angus King conducted the burial service. A large number of vehicles containing friends of the deceased followed the hearse.

Among those who sent wreaths were the Transport Agency Company and employés, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. F. Gregory, Mr. and Mrs. Phelan, and some friends in the Civil Service.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"He serves all who dares be true."

IN the year 1848 the city of Paris was the scene of a terrible riot, and soldiers were called out to enforce order. Picture to yourselves what took place. A mob of maddened men, with no more self-control than wild animals possess, tearing down the streets after their leader, killing the soldiers, spiking their guns, and treading their fallen companions under foot in the midst of the blaze of cannon and the roar of hoarse voices. Suddenly, in front of the rioters, in the middle of the street where the tumult was the hottest, a white-haired man appeared, with head uncovered, signalling for silence. At the sight the rioters fell back; and, in the sudden hush, the voice of their leader was heard crying, "Citizens! it is De la Eure! sixty years of pure life is about to address you!"

This story is true, and I tell it to you because it affords an instance of the power of noble character. That old man had such wonderful influence over his wild fellow citizens because of the brave, true life they all knew he had led among them. His presence and his quiet voice did what the soldiers and their weapons failed to do; and, in that part of Paris, the rioters slunk away transformed, for the time, into orderly men.

It has been said that the best words of praise that could be carved upon a man's tomb are: "His presence made bad men good." Think how grand it would be to grow up to be such a man that no one could dare even to speak a wrong word in his presence. This is what we mean by the influence of character, the power a good person has over other people. It does not come to anyone by chance and without preparation. We are all making our characters in boyhood and girlhood and through youth, and in manhood and womanhood. We do not know the history of that grand old man in Paris who had gained by his goodness such power over his fellow-men, but we may be sure he had been faithful in his daily life to what he knew was right and good. "He serves all who dares be true."

Most boys and girls like stories of daring and courage. Do you ever think that the really best kind of courage is the courage that dares to be true to what is right? How hard it is for all of us not to give way to temptation when we are urged to do so and the way seems pleasant. Even children know this, and sometimes have a hard fight within themselves to keep to the truth or to say "No" bravely and turn away from doing or saying what is wrong. Now it is just in this way, while we are young and while our habits are not yet formed, that the making of our characters begins. The men and women who have led the grandest lives and done most for the world have been those who kept true to what they knew was right, though at times they had to stand almost alone, and were scorned and laughed at. See how grand it is to help the world thus by noble examples which, in time, others follow. These are God's soldiers, who fight for Him against wrong. The men and women who have dared to be "in the right with two or three" are our heroes and heroines whom we love and honour, and whose example we have to follow.

"He serves all who dares be true."

Ralph Waldo Emerson, a famous American, wrote these words, and I want to tell you one little story about him when he was a boy, which will show you, I think, what sort of character was growing up within him in his young days. You must know that his father died when he was only eight years old, and his mother, who had five boys to bring up, was very poor. But Ralph began at once to be her brave helper and her comfort in all sorts of ways. Now for the short story:—

Ralph had a great love for reading and a passionate longing for books, but he only possessed three or four, beside his school-books, and those he had read over and over again. One day, on his way to the free grammar-school, which gave the best education his mother could afford for him at that time, Ralph passed a circulating library. He always looked in longingly, and this time he saw in the window a book of adventure he had often heard of—a book of brave, daring deeds such as boys love to read. He had a few cents in his pocket, and, almost without a second thought, he ran in and borrowed the book.

Oh, what a thrilling story that was! And it ran into a second volume with the best part yet to come! But Ralph never got that second volume. He had felt selfish as he read the precious first volume, knowing that his mother needed every cent she could get to provide for the wants of the family; and when he took the book back, he left the exciting tale unfinished.

You will not be surprised to hear that when Ralph grew up he was one of the great men who "serve all because they dare be true." "Be, and not seem," was one of his sayings; another was, "A great soul will be strong to live as well as strong to think." For he had found out, even in boyhood, that it is not enough to have good thoughts if we do not carry them out into deeds.

There is no room here to tell you about the brave, true life he lived; but this you must know, that if ever he heard of a wrong that needed righting Emerson was certain to be on the side of the right, though the whole world might seem to be against him; and more than once he gave up what he loved best in life that he might be true to the best he knew. So he became a grand influence in the world, and the words he spoke and wrote, and his example, have helped to make numbers of men and women into those who dare to be true.

When Emerson died the people of Concord, in Massachusetts, where his home was, draped their streets in black; but they would have no name carved upon the shining rock that marked his grave, for they said their friend and helper, whose beautiful life had been lived among them, did not lie there. Ralph Waldo Emerson, who wrote those fine words, "He serves all who dares be true," wrote also the following verse for boys and girls; for he remembered that the making of a brave noble character begins in childhood, and he wanted to give them courage in their young lives, and to remind them that if they are brave and faithful they cannot fail in being true to the right:—

So nigh is grandeur to our dust,
So near is God to man,
When duty whispers low "thou must,"
The youth replies "I can."

LONDON, APRIL 19, 1902.

A COMING CENTENARY.

Monday, April 21, is the ninety-seventh anniversary, and three years hence we shall celebrate the centenary, of the birth of James Martineau. During the present year we look forward to the publication of the Life of our great Teacher, on which Dr. Drummond and Professor Upton have been engaged, and which is nearing completion. Then we shall have a fresh opportunity of entering into the secret of a wonderful life, and shall be admitted, as we confidently hope, to yet closer intimacy with one who for more than two generations spoke with prophetic power to his fellow-men.

Yet even if there were no such happy privilege in store for us, we should be aware of a great treasury of wisdom and inspiration already in our possession in the published writings of Dr. Martineau, a treasury unexhausted and inexhaustible, because such riches as we have in his prayers, and in the "Endeavours" and the "Hours of Thought," belong to the undying things in which the long familiar words kindle to ever fresh and deeper meaning for a growing spiritual life, while in the volumes of Essays and Addresses, no less than in the greater philosophical works, there are wide regions of thought, as yet, we will venture to affirm, unexplored by the majority of our people, yet offering abundant nurture for their higher life, regions of thought rendered beautiful by the light of genius and offering to the earnest thinker the highest stimulus of profound insight and lofty moral fervour.

The works of no philosopher, not even the greatest, can be final, and the passion of the moral and spiritual teacher is something greater than the special form of his teaching, or any theory he may propound. This, we believe, is what will make the works of Dr. Martineau imperishable. In his companionship we gain fresh insight into the greatness and nobility of man, with a keen searching into character and the springs of human action, and an unfolding of the true meaning of Christian discipleship, while the glory of the universe kindles in the poet's thought, and that which is Divine lays hold upon us, in the strength of eternal Righteousness and in the Love which is greatest of all.

Looking back at this moment, and telling over again the separate treasures of our store, we turned to the fourth volume of Dr. Martineau's collected "Essays, Reviews, and Addresses," the volume which contains his College addresses and a number of occasional sermons, some of them of the deepest personal, as well as religious, interest. There we found a College address and a sermon belonging to the same year, forty years ago, and from these, as examples of what may be gathered abundantly from that rich store, we will reproduce here some passages, such as it may be well to ponder on this anniversary.

The College address on "The Transient and the Permanent in Theology" was delivered in October, 1862, and naturally recalled the passing of the Act of Uniformity two hundred years before, and what it had signified to the Church of England, and the freer life of English Nonconformity. Proceeding then to speak of the freedom that is essential to a truly progressive spiritual life, Dr. Martineau traced the chief lines of his thought, afterwards so fully worked out and richly illustrated, as to the immediate relation of the soul to God. In the course of this exposition the following passage occurs :—

> The great medium of divine contact with our world is not, after all, the physical Cosmos, that speaks God's power and the method of His thought, but the constitution and course of human history, which are the organs of His communicated character and will. Clear traces of himself He has doubtless impressed upon the individual soul. But individuality itself is not formed except in society and by long inheritance of time; it is the last product of rich and various culture; and the philosopher or worshipper of to-day is an epitome of all the ages. The lives of other men, their spoken admiration, their acted grief and passion, the stature of their higher nobleness, touch us with more than sympathy, and are the great means of showing us what we are, and lifting us towards what we are not yet. Biography, history, and language—that wonderful crystallisation of the very flow and spray of thought—constitute an objective self-knowledge, and, by a thousand affinities, draw out into clearer light whatever our nature holds of authoritative and divine. If men have never and nowhere been left alone by their Heavenly Guide, if His mystery has always mingled with their life, ancient and foreign literature can in no case be quite profane, but in their artless expressions of wonder, love and pity, must appeal to some pieties in us; and even where no religious end is directly in view, a wide and scholarly familiarity with the words and ways of other times, with their special types of character, with the tone of their poetry and the temper of their laws, indirectly generates an atmosphere of humane and considerate sympathy, the proper climate of justice and veneration. It is not, however, till we address ourselves to men's conscious thought about divine things, their efforts to pass behind the veil of the visible world and read the secrets there, that we begin to glean and count the scattered elements of sacred truth on which the higher trusts of humanity have lived. The time is past when faiths and philosophies foreign to our own were studied merely to contrast their darkness with our light, and make the chasm absolute all round our solitary island of exclusive revelation. We begin to see that they were the noble efforts of a reason never wholly baffled, a conscience never quite asleep, and became the depositaries of partial truth, till the stream of "living water" could take up the confluent tributaries and fill the river of life. In this thought we gain, for the first time, the key of interpretation for what is alien to our experience. Antipathy understands nothing; and not till the theologian looks on Christendom as the last stage in the providential evolution and inspiration of humanity, related to all that goes before, will he apprehend either what lies within or what lies beyond his own faith. But once let him seize this point of view, and then the attempt to master systems of thought belonging to another intellectual latitude will afford him the finest discipline of understanding and sympathy; and while imparting a catholic breadth of aspiration for what is distant from him, will leave the keenest sense of the distinctive sanctities that abide with him at home.

Earlier in the same year Dr. Martineau had preached the sermon at the opening of the new Rosslyn Hill Chapel, at Hampstead, the devotional service having been conducted by Dr. Sadler, minister of the congregation. The central thought of that sermon, on "Worship in Spirit," with the text John xvii. 20, 21, is the union of the Divine and Human in Christ, as typical of the true life of man, opening the way for that spiritual communion which is the highest gift of Christianity to the world and the mark of its distinctive life, for the nurture of which such a house of prayer was built. That thought Dr. Martineau thus expounds :—

> The union of the Divine and the Human in Christ, while unique in its perfection, is no lonely prerogative of his individual person, but belongs to him as the ideal and representative of our humanity; and, were it not a possibility and law for all our souls, its manifestation in him would be a barren wonder without significance. He is a Revelation, because the mists of nature, as they cleared off and set him face to face with his Inspirer, also took the veil from all our hearts, and made us aware that we are not all human, through and through, but bear the traces of "Emmanuel, God with us." His personal closeness to the Father within him, his filial intercourse, his utter self-surrender, his holy transfiguration of the natural life, would have no meaning or power for us, did it not speak to sympathetic possibilities in ourselves, and give the divine interpretation of our existence.

In this view, then, the blending of the Divine and Human in Christ reveals a similar blending of the two in the constitution of our humanity. In the consciousness of this consists discipleship to him. And the life of Communion with the Divine Guide abiding in us;—of personal affection towards himself and trust in the leadings of his thought;—of recognition, eye to eye;—of surrender, will to will:—this first, this last, this throughout all, is the characteristic of the Christian mind. Nowhere but in Christendom is Religion the immediate communion between the Divine and the human spirit,—the descent of God, the ascent of man, into the region of a common sympathy with the pure, the true, the good. Other faiths and philosophies have acknowledged a sacredness in the Moral Law, and claimed the sanction of Divine authority for the rules of Justice and Beneficence; but have regarded these as intimations from a distance,—a legislation put into the frame of things;—or else, a higher action of our own constitution, still leaving us in our personal isolation. It was reserved for Christ to dissipate this dim dream of God at second-hand;—to rend away the interposing veil from Conscience and holy love, and let them come to us as the glance of His living eye, the real pleading of His nature with ours. Thus disclosing the permanent Incarnation of God in our humanity, he quickened ethical relations into personal, carried us out of ourselves, turned painful struggles into loving surrender, and made perfect our natural weakness in supernatural strength. The dreadful loneliness of our nature—the silence of the heart with its own bitterness—is gone. The prayer of every suffering and tempted soul is answered,—"O my God, send me not out, leave me not here, to fight a sad fight, to faint and fail, alone!" The whole distinctive power of Christianity lies in this—that it annihilates the interval between the Father of spirits and ourselves and brings Him in person into the midst of our own life; no longer putting us off with past and future belongings to him, suspended meanwhile for a period of independent experience in which we are let alone; but establishing immediate relations with Him, perpetuated through all the hours, and felt through all our secret life.

One more passage from this sermon we will quote, with its direct appeal, spoken forty years ago to the members of the Rosslyn Hill congregation. Many will recall the living tones of the preacher's voice, some even who were present on that very occasion. It is an appeal which, in all our churches, we shall do well to take home to ourselves, and, in the silence of reverent and grateful memories, ask what our answer to such words must be:—

I sometimes fear that the men of this generation have lost the mental attitude of simple piety, and do not personally mingle in the strains of prayer and lose themselves in the reality of God; that their energies are so accustomed to command and conquer what is beneath them, as not readily to lie low and susceptible under what is above them; that to their free and easy complacency, master of everything, docile to nothing, there will be little that is solemn, deep and holy, till they come to die into it. Oh! friends, be it not so with you. Lay not on your faithful preacher's soul the intolerable suspicion, that his purest fervours come to nothing and burn out in the cold fuel of unanswering natures. Force him not to distrust his best enthusiasms. Never add yourselves on to that dead weight of natural temptation which bears down on the prophetic spirit, and stifles the exit of God's light. Here let another spirit prevail. Let us bring into our communion, not the exacting and excepting intellect, but the waiting and kindling heart, quick to mingle its flame with the ascending fires of sacrifice. Let the prison walls of deadening custom fall from us at the tones of prayer, and light flow round, and the winds pass by, from the open Infinite. Once humble and genial to a spirit higher than our own, we shall find ourselves in an invisible communion, drawing us with sweet and mystic ties away from anger, care and sorrow, and making us one with each other, with Christ, with God. Of such blending worship be this the scene, and so may the place be indeed the very House of God, and none other than the Gate of Heaven

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

The Council met at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., and afterwards Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C. (President), presiding.

There were also present:—The Rev. F. Allen, Mr. H. Blessley, Miss Burkitt, the Rev. George Carter, Mr. Edgar Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Howard Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. John Harrison, the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A., Miss H. Brooke Herford, Miss Florence Hill, Mr. H. B. Lawford, Mr. J. S. Lister, Miss M. Martineau, the Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. F. Pinnock, Mr. J. G. Pinnock, the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, Miss Preston, Mr. J. T. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Miss E. Sharpe, the Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A., Rev. F. W. Stanley, the Rev. J. E. Stronge, Mr. J. Sudbery, Miss Tagart, Mr. W. H. Talbot, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler, Miss Tayler, Miss Teschemacher, Mr. E. C. Thurgood, the Rev. W. Wooding, B.A., Mr. T. Pallister Young, B.A., LL.B., and the Secretary, the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

The minutes of the meeting held Oct. 30, 1901, were read and confirmed.

The following report was then read:—

Since the last meeting of the Council six meetings of the Executive Committee and twenty-two meetings of the various Sub-Committees have been held.

Finance:—The statement of income and expenditure for the year ending Dec. 31, 1901, shows that subscriptions yielded £1,634, a decrease of £25 compared with the previous year; congregational collections £575, an increase of £3; donations and special collections £230, an increase of £52; dividends and interest £948, a decrease of £10; miscellaneous income £60, same as last year. The Book Department yielded £1,476, an increase of £149. The total income for the year, less £276 received and paid to the congregation at Auckland, amounted to £4,926. The expenditure for the year included £2,602 paid in grants; £1,042 in printing, binding, and purchasing books and pamphlets; £711 in salaries and wages of the office and book-room staff; £242 in maintenance and working expenses; and £59 in special items. The sum of £225, borrowed from the investment account in 1900, was repaid; and a balance of £82 was carried to 1902.

During the first quarter of the present year the Treasurer had received £785 in subscriptions, £27 in collections, £32 in donations, £283 in dividends and interest, and £359 from the book department. The expenditure during the same period includes £724 in grants, £179 in salaries, and £132 for books and pamphlets. A number of trade and other accounts have fallen due since March 31, and when they are all paid, along with grants recently voted, the balance at the bank will be used up. In consequence of the interest created by the New Century meetings last May, several additional subscriptions have been received, but these amounts have not yet covered the losses sustained by the death of old subscribers. The Committee received from the late Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain the handsome gift of £1,000; and legacies of £100 from Miss E. A. Gibson and £50 from Mrs. T. R. Dobson have been paid by their executors. It is most gratifying to the Committee to report that 207 congregations took part in the annual collections on behalf of the Association—the largest number on record since "Association Sunday" was started in 1888.

Mission Work.—The Committee devote much time and thought to the applications which they receive for grants of money in aid of missionary work, for the salaries of ministers, for chapel buildings, and other purposes. Their one desire is to prove helpful and to stimulate local effort. For the current year grants at the following rates have been voted:—Acton, £10; Ashton-under-Lyne, £90; Bedfield, £30; Boston, £20; Bournemouth, £25; Bradford (Manchester), £40; Bridgend, £15; Cardiff, £20; Carlisle, £45; Choppington, £15; Chorlton, £35; Clydach Vale, £15; Congleton, £20; Crewkerne, £25; Darlington, £50; Deal, £5; Denton, £45; Elland, £20; Framlingham, £20; Gateshead, £45 till June 30, then at rate of £75; Great Hucklow, £10; Halstead, £5; Hastings, £35; Heaton Moor, £40; Huddersfield, £40; King's Lynn, £10; Leicester (Narborough-road), £20; London—Bermondsey, £20; Forest Gate, £52 10s.; Kilburn, £10; Lewisham, £65; Mansford-street, £15; Plumstead, £65; Stepney, £15; Lydgate, £10; Loughborough, £10; Macclesfield, £30; Malton, £10; Middlesbrough, £30; Newark, £18; Newbury, £20; Newton Abbot, £10; Nottage, £10; Nottingham, Christ Church, £30; Pentre, £17 10s.; Plymouth, £15; Pontypridd, £40; Poole, rate of £35 to June, then rate of £30; Small Heath, £50; Southampton, £75; South Shields, £10; Stratford-on-Avon, £50; Sychbant, £5; Torquay, £30; Urmston, £40; Walsall, £10; Whitchurch, £10; Wolverhampton, £80; Walthamstow, £10; Yeovil, £15; Wick, £5. Grants to Missionaries:—Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties, £100; North Midland Association, £100; Western Union, £72 10s. For Foreign work, the following amounts have been voted:—Auckland, £75; Brussels, £10; Budapest, £50; Icelandic student, £50; Japanese student, £75; Melbourne, £100, spread over three years. Grants for special purposes have been voted as follows since the last meeting of the Council:—Aberdare, £10 for repairs to chapel; Boston, £10 for repairs to chapel; Braintree, £10 for special lectures and services; Devonport, £21 for purchase of freehold; Forest Gate, £15 for alterations; Great Hucklow, £25 for alterations to chapel building; Killinchy, up to £10 for special lectures; Leicester (Narborough-road), £50 towards debt on building, conditionally; Maidstone, £5, special services; Moss Side (Manchester), £50 for furnishing, £5 towards circulation of Welsh literature.

The Secretary and a few members of the Committee have visited various grant-aided congregations in different parts of the country, and the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., has very kindly rendered most efficient and helpful service in this way in South Wales and in the districts covered by the Eastern and Western Unions. All the Unitarian Chapels in Cardiganshire have recently been visited by the Secretary, and he was greatly interested in the evidences of religious earnestness and zeal which he witnessed throughout the country. As the representative of the Association, the Secretary was everywhere welcomed with the utmost cordiality. The Committee recognise that the visitation of congregations living in remote parts of the country is a duty which they ought to keep ever in mind, and this department of their work calls for further extension, as was pointed out in the annual report two years ago.

Publications.—The Council will be interested to learn that the revised and enlarged "Essex Hall Hymnal" is now passing through the press, and will be issued, it is hoped, by Whitsuntide. The Committee believe it will win its way, as the present edition has done, among a large number of congregations; for no effort has been spared to prepare a book eminently suitable for Unitarian and Free Christian Churches. In the course of its preparation, suggestions have been received, and carefully considered, from at least one hundred persons, ministers and laymen. The "Year Book for 1902" was issued in an improved form, and it is an indispensable handbook to all who desire to make themselves acquainted with our churches and societies. It is published at a loss, even if all the copies were sold, but a free copy is presented to a great many ministers and members of the Association. A large number of pamphlets have been circulated since the last meeting of the Council, through the agency of Postal Missions and in other ways. Among the new pamphlets recently published, the Committee would call attention to "Twentieth Century Unitarianism," by the Rev. Frank Walters; "The Nation's Peril," by the Rev. T. J. Hardy; "The Religion of Oliver Wendell Holmes," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; and "Unitarian Christianity and Citizenship," by the late Rev. John Dendy. Several Unitarian leaflets and pamphlets have been reprinted, a quarter of a million of a few of the more popular tracts have now been circulated. The Committee, acting on the advice of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, have made a large grant of books and tracts for use by the Unitarian churches in Canada, where it was thought many people would be glad to read English publications; the literature has been eagerly accepted at Hamilton, Ottawa, St. John, and Toronto. The volume of lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century," by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, has been delayed a little longer than was at first anticipated, but it is being prepared for the press and will be issued in the early autumn. A Welsh translation of "Back to Jesus," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, prepared by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, towards the cost of which a grant has been promised, will be published shortly by the South Wales Unitarian Association. The Council will also be interested to learn that the second edition of "God and the Soul," by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong has been exhausted, and a third edition is now in the press: it is very gratifying that a book of this thoughtful type should have had such a large circulation.

McQuaker Fund.—The grants towards the salaries of ministers of Unitarian churches in Scotland have been voted for the year 1902 at the following rates:—Aberdeen, £95; Dundee, £85; Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street), £90; Kilmarnock, £100; Kirkcaldy, £100. Mr. A. Irvine Innes has been appointed minister at Kilmarnock; Mr. G. A. Ferguson, now studying at Manchester College, Oxford, will settle at Kirkcaldy in August next. The Rev. Alex. Webster, of Aberdeen, is hard at work begging money for a new church in the most central part of the city. The Committee quite agree that in such an important place as Aberdeen a building worthy of the Unitarian cause should be erected. They have made a grant of £750 from the McQuaker Fund, and they hope many liberal donations will be forthcoming to supplement the £500 which the congregation themselves are pledged to find. A course of Unitarian lectures has recently been delivered by the Revs. James Forrest and E. T. Russell in the vicinity of Glasgow, towards the cost of which the Committee have contributed £41. A special grant of £15 has enabled the congregation at Dundee, aided by their own efforts, to pay the whole of the outstanding accounts incurred in alterations and improvements to the church and school buildings. Grants of Unitarian books and pamphlets have been freely made for circulation in Scotland, in accordance with the wish expressed in Mr. McQuaker's Will. The vacancy on the Committee caused by the death of Mr. G. L. Bristow was filled by the appointment of Dr. J. Barlow, the President of the Scottish Unitarian Association. His presence and counsel will prove helpful to the Committee in the administration of the McQuaker Fund.

Work in India.—The very recent issue of the special report on the work in India renders it unnecessary to make any lengthy reference to what has been done. The fears expressed at the last Council respecting the health of the Rev. S. F. Williams were speedily realised, for he died soon afterwards. The resolutions embodied in the special report show how deep an impression he made upon the people in India among whom he laboured; and the Unitarians of this country have lost in him an able and devoted worker whose memory will long remain a precious heritage. The following grants have been voted for the current year:—Mr. Akbar Masih, £25; Khasi Hills Missions, £100; Madras, £28, with a small grant for repairs; Indian student, £100. With the exception of the appointment of a European missionary, the other operations formerly carried on are being continued. The demand for Unitarian literature appears to be quite as keen as ever it was, and most appreciative letters are received.

Deputations.—At the annual meetings of the following Societies the Association was represented:—The Protestantenbond at Utrecht, by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong; East Cheshire Christian Union at Ashton-under-Lyne, by the Secretary; Manchester District Association at Manchester, by the President and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant; South Wales Unitarian Association at Capel-y-Groes, by the Secretary; South East Wales Society at Cardiff, by the President and the Secretary; and at the forthcoming annual meeting of the Western Union, to be held at Bath, the Association will be represented by the President and the Rev. F. W. Stanley. The Rev. James Harwood and Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee attended the laying of the foundation-stone of the new church at Merthyr Tydvil.

Deceased Members.—In addition to Mr. Clayden, Mr. Rathbone, and Dr. Vance-Smith, already mentioned, the Committee regret to report that several other honoured members of the Association have passed away since the Council held its last meeting:—Mr. Robert Belben of Poole, Mr. Edward Bromley of London, Mr. Robert Cuddeford of Exeter, Mr. W. B. Hughes of Swansea, Mr. John Leach of Yarmouth, Miss Alice Lee of Kinver, Mrs. Joseph Lupton of Leeds, Miss C. A. Martineau of London, Mr. F. S. Schwann of London, Mr. Henry Tate of Liverpool, and Mr. James Youngman of Framlingham. These are a few of the men and women long connected with the Association whose deaths the Committee now lament, and to whose relatives and friends they would offer their sincere sympathy in the sad loss which they have sustained.

Discussion on the Report.

Mr. F. Pinnock (Secretary Southern Unitarian Association) asked for particulars respecting the grant to Southampton, which had been reduced, it was thought, without due notice being given to the congregation.

The Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who replied as Chairman of the Mission Committee, quoted from the correspondence, showing that this impression was unfounded, and that exceptionally favourable consideration had been given to this case.

Mr. Pinnock expressed entire satisfaction with the explanation given.

Mr. J. Harrison suggested that a musical edition of the Revised Hymnal should be prepared; and Miss Sharpe hoped the book would be thoroughly representative of Unitarian doctrine. The Rev. H. Woods Perris said it was most desirable that the Hymnal should be an inclusive work, adapted to the needs of all varieties of thought in the churches. The old edition seemed to him a fair attempt to meet this ideal. and he hoped the new one would be found still better.

The Chairman (Mr. Martineau) said he believed the new edition would show great improvement in every way, and the Committee had confidence that it would be widely welcomed.

The Rev. H. S. Solly said that it was desirable not to lose touch with the Protestant Verein of Germany, a Broad Church body in close affinity with Unitarian principles.

The Secretary said a representative of the Verein attended the Twentieth Century meetings last year, and a regular correspondence was kept up with that organisation.

Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, after referring sympathetically to the deaths of Mr. E. Bromley and Mr. F. S. Schwann, strongly pressed the suggestion that the Committee should consider the advisability of appointing a general missionary agent for the country.

The President (Mr. W. Blake Odgers, who now took the chair) moved the reception of the Report, which was carried unanimously.

Anniversary Week.

The Secretary announced the arrangements for the Whit-week meetings of the Association, and added particulars as to the other meetings of the week. The whole programme includes the S.S.A. breakfast and annual meeting (Tuesday morning); Essex Hall lecture, by Principal Drummond (Tuesday evening); annual service, Little Portland-street, preacher Rev. H. Gow (Wednesday); annual business meeting and public meeting (also on Wednesday); conference on "Types of Religious Experience" (Thursday morning), and conversazione on Thursday evening.

Mr. T. Pallister Young hoped the Committee might find it possible sometimes to arrange for a temperance meeting in connection with the Association.

The Secretary replied that the Unitarian Temperance Association would have its meeting announced along with other notices for the week.

The New President.

The Secretary then read the corrections of lists of members of Council, Committee

Officers, and Foreign Correspondents, whose names would be submitted, if approved by the Council, to the annual meeting. It was announced, amid applause, that the Rev. R. A. Armstrong had cordially accepted a proposal that he should be nominated as the new President.

DECEASED MEMBERS.

The President referred to the losses of distinguished members mentioned in the report. Miss C. A. Martineau, he said, had done exellent work in connection with a college for working men and women in South London; Admiral Elliot was a fearless thinking and upright citizen; and Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain had rendered distinguished service to his country and they would remember him, not alone for his generous gifts to that Association and the Southampton congregation, but for his example as a constant attendant at the little church that stood for the religious principles which he held dear. The President thought that without boasting they might claim to have more than a numerical proportion of such leaders of public life in their congregations. He wished, on that occasion, to say how deeply they felt the loss and honoured the memory of three of their late colleagues. Mr. P. W. Clayden had been a member of that Council since 1860, Dr. G. Vance Smith since 1859, and Mr. W. Rathbone since 1878. Mr. Clayden had served on the Committee, and there, as in all his duties, he showed an example of untiring energy, zeal and good temper. His ministerial career represented but one side of his work for the public good, and in his long and honourable connection with the Daily News he displayed equal talent and devotion to great causes, and especially to education. An accomplished author, as well as journalist, he had died full of honours; and his name would be remembered as that of an eminent preacher, philanthropist, and politician. Dr. G. Vance Smith had spent, by contrast, a quiet studious life. He believed he was at the time of his death the oldest surviving student of York College, and there and at Carmarthen Dr. Smith had exerted the happiest influence on generations of students. But he would probably be most remembered as one of the Revisers of the translation of the Bible—and thus a sharer in a work the importance of which was even yet scarcely apprehended. Of Mr. William Rathbone he felt it was indeed difficult to say anything adequate. A man of the simplest piety, the strictest integrity, of high business capacity, he applied his time and means to ameliorate the condition of the poor, to improve the standard of education, and to strengthen and purify public life. As a politician, his influence was in some respects unique; and his interest and help on behalf of reform in local government had been simply invaluable. But what was most noteworthy in his career was the way in which, from all the more prominent public questions in which he was interested, he returned continually to the service of the poor and degraded; and one of his latest works was the initiation of the idea of "District Nurses." Of all such men as those he had named they might well be gratefully proud, and reverently say to them all: "Well done, good and faithful servants; enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

MINISTERS' PENSION FUND.

Mr. T. Pallister Young moved, and the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope seconded, the following resolution:—

That this Council tenders to the Special Committee appointed by the Triennial Conference, and particularly to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., its warm congratulations on the successful issue of their labours in establishing the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund; and places on record its high appreciation of the generous way in which Unitarians in all parts of the country have responded to the appeals made to them on behalf of the Fund.

The President, in supporting the resolution, said the National Conference had done several noble works of permanent value, and he thought this was, perhaps, the noblest of them all. Thanks were due to all those who had initiated or carried into effect so beneficial a project, but amongst them there was none who deserved their gratitude so much as Professor Estlin Carpenter. It was right that they who had done nothing for the project (quâ B. and F., he interjected, though, with a slight variation of individuals here and there, they were very much the same people whether working under one name or the other) should express very cordially their gladness that so good a work had been done.

The resolution was carried with applause.

EDUCATION.

Mr. D. Martineau, on behalf of the Committee, moved the following resolution:—

The Council cordially approves of the principle that within a certain area there should be but one authority for the co-ordination and control of all grades of education, provided that the areas are large but not unwieldy, and provided the educational authority is in close touch with the electorate and holds its power directly from the ratepayers. But the Council views with grave distrust the provisions of the Education Bill now before the House of Commons so far as its treatment of Board Schools is concerned, and strongly condemns those sections of the Bill which would leave the management of thousands of schools in the hands of private persons, while calling upon the community to provide the whole cost of maintenance. The Council is of opinion that no settlement of the Education question can be equitable which violates the principle that, where the people are called upon to pay, the people should rule through their duly elected representatives, or that permits the continued imposition of ecclesiastical or theological tests upon teachers in rate-supported schools.

He believed that, whatever shades of political feeling existed amongst them, all would agree with this resolution. He specially emphasised the injury done to public education by the practice of excluding teachers who were often the most skilful, in order to appoint others who professed orthodox opinions.

Mr. H. Blessley (Southampton), as a member of the School Board for many years, seconded the resolution, and strongly condemned the Bill.

The Rev. H. W. Perris said Unitarians must make this question a matter not of political expediency but of conscience. The Bill meant practically a new establishment of Catholicism in this country. He hoped no creeping paralysis would prevent their ministers and laymen from strenuously opposing the Bill.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, being asked by the President to speak as an educational expert, said he should welcome a proposal to have one educational authority for each district, but it must be a genuine and popularly-controlled authority. He pointed out that this would not be given by the Bill as drafted, and gave illustrations of its proposals. It would establish "denominationalism" for all time, and at the public cost. All the diocesan authorities appeared to be grateful for the Bill, not on any consideration that it would improve education, but that it would give them more public money. He deeply lamented the present strain on the consciences of teachers, and said this evil would certainly increase if the Bill became law.

The President added a few words in support of the resolution, which was then carried unanimously.

This concluded the business of the Council.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

Sir,—It may be interesting to your readers, as well as to the Rev. Joseph H. Wicksteed, to know that the greater and more important part of the Lord's Prayer was in use in the Jewish synagogues fifty years before Jesus was born. Among other authorities for the assertion, I mention the Rev. Christian D. Ginsburg, LL.D., who was a clergyman of the Church of England, and wrote the Essay on Gamaliel II. in "Smith and Wace's Dictionary," Vol. II., 1880.

Charles Voysey.

Annesley Lodge, Platt's-lane,
April 4. Hampstead, N.W.

Sir,—I hope your readers are as grateful as they should be to you for publishing, and to Mr. J. H. Wicksteed for sending to you, the article in your last issue on "The Lord's Prayer and the Prayer of Jesus." It seems to me admirable in its sympathetic spirit and its painstaking treatment of a most interesting question, and the pages of The Inquirer afford a possibility, hardly to be found elsewhere, for its reverent and unbiassed discussion.

But Mr. Wicksteed has not fully convinced me that I must give up my belief that Jesus is the author of the Lord's Prayer—at any rate, the author in a sense which is true and important. I go heartily with him in his argument that Luke has not condensed his version of the Prayer from that given in Matthew. I do not doubt that the author of Luke wrote without having Matthew (in its present form) before him. But this does not prove that Matthew's version is less authentic than Luke's. The grand characteristic of Matthew is that its authors (it is obviously a composite Gospel) had access to some ancient and authentic material which had not been utilised by earlier writers, and its version of the Prayer may have formed part of this material. Mere priority proves very little. There is no doubt that Mark is the earliest of all the Gospels, but this fact has never been regarded as proving that all not contained in it is of doubtful authenticity. It is a most tantalising Gospel, continually not telling us just what we want to know. So must many of the earliest disciples have felt, and they would try to supplement its narrative from other sources. Luke represents one of these attempts, and later, the final editor of Matthew gathered into that Gospel all that he could learn from the written and oral sources available. It must be remembered that the Gospel for the Apostolic Age was, first, the preaching of the hearers of the words of Jesus; and, secondly, the repetition by their hearers of these same recollections. When the time came for writing a Gospel, the work of the evangelist would be curiously like the operation described last week by Miss Sudbery when she questions her class to see what they remember of the teaching given them the previous Sunday. One scholar will remember one point, a second will recall another, and by piecing them together, the teacher will gradually collect, more or less, the whole of the lesson. Such must have been the action of the evangelists, and we can not only be sure that each one had to do it, but we ourselves, by critically examining the statements in all three synoptics, can sometimes feel sure that we have recovered a truth lying behind all three narratives. For instance, compare Mark xiv. 65 with Luke xxii. 63, 64, and Matt. xxvi. 67, 68. Thus we learn that the cruel mockery to which Jesus was subjected after he had claimed to be the Christ and had been condemned for blasphemy on that account, included this treatment: He was blindfolded, and then struck in the face and asked to say, in virtue of his power as Christ, who it was that struck him. But Mark omits to say what it was that Jesus was asked to prophecy, and neither Mark nor Luke give the significant words, "Thou Christ"; while Matthew, who gives these words, actually omits to mention the blindfolding. Only by comparing the narratives, especially Mark and Matthew, can we see what happened.

This same principle may be applied to the Lord's Prayer. Luke certainly gives a more likely occasion for its first teaching than Matthew, and I do not think Mr. Wicksteed's treatment of the reference to John's disciples convincing. After the death of Jesus, the movement started by John seems to have rapidly dwindled and died, and I doubt if there was ever a time during the period when the Gospels were taking shape when the disciples of Jesus were anxious to be put on a level with the disciples of John. On the other hand, the Sermon on the Mount is obviously a compilation. There may have been some great occasion which lived in the memory of disciples when Jesus uttered a discourse of special interest and value, and this may have furnished the nucleus of both Matthew's Sermon on the Mount and Luke's Sermon on the Plain, but Matthew, at any rate, has utilised the occasion to group together sayings in an appropriate connection, and I cannot doubt that the writer has introduced here, in connection with other utterances on prayer, what he had learned to regard as the prayer given by Jesus to his disciples to help and guide them in all their devotions.

Of course, all this amounts to no guarantee that we have exactly the words and sentences framed by Jesus. Indeed, my private conviction is that if Jesus had on two separate occasions complied with a request to teach his disciples to pray, he would have given them much the same meaning in somewhat different words; that is to say, he would have attached importance to the sense and general spirit of the act of devotion, not to any exact phraseology. Now, it is a curious fact that we have the Prayer in three forms, for the form in use in our Prayer-book is not identical with either that in Matthew or Luke, and it is possible that this ancient liturgy takes us right back to a primitive use of the Prayer in little communities, who had been taught it by those who remembered hearing the words uttered by Jesus himself. Supposing, however, all we can be certain of is that Jesus is the author of the sense and spirit of the prayer, still I should regard him as its author. It is difficult to be certain of more than this in respect to any of his recorded sayings. Our belief that, nevertheless, we do know something of the actual teaching of Jesus rests upon our knowledge of the extent to which his religious genius transcended the grasp of his disciples. So far from being able to originate teaching on the same spiritual level as his own, they could not even comprehend what he spake unto them. But much of it they could faithfully record. And I think it is more likely that we have a faithful record of a prayer given by Jesus not as a talisman, but in the sense indicated by the words: "After this manner pray ye," than that the whole was evolved out of the sayings quoted by Mr. Wicksteed from Mark. Those sayings indicate an essential harmony between the Prayer and the habitual mind of Jesus, but it is a long step from this to regard them as its source.

I have trespassed already on your space more than I intended, so with regard to the question whether Jesus was likely to give his disciples any form of prayer, I will only say that just as he selected the two Commandments from among all the precepts of the Law, so he may well have selected the petitions of the Lord's Prayer from the great mass of Jewish prayers which we know existed in his time. Each act would be equally consistent with the spirituality of his religion.

Bridport, April 12.

THE JUBILEE OF THE UNITARIAN CHURCH, MELBOURNE.

Sir,—Will you permit me to appeal through your paper to those friends who may be interested in the work of the Unitarian Church in Melbourne? For some years now the congregation has had to contend against adverse circumstances that have seriously impaired its vitality. Notwithstanding generous help from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, it has been faced with a pretty constant deficit that has discouraged the small band of workers. Then the losses from removals and deaths have been serious of late. The low condition of church-life in general in Melbourne has seriously impeded the work of recuperation.

The condition is, however, by no means hopeless. We have a small but united congregation, and new members are joining slowly; we have a Sunday-school steadily growing in size, and an active Young Peoples' Guild and Religious Union that are full of promise for the future; and now there is a feeling of confidence and hope such as we have long been strangers to.

The efficiency of the church is impeded for the want of about £50 a year. This being the Jubilee year of the foundation of the church, we have decided to make a great effort to terminate this condition of things by raising a Jubilee Fund of at least £500. This sum is, however, beyond the resources of the people unaided, and we appeal to friends in England to assist us in this necessary work. Without such help the recovery of the church will be indefinitely postponed.

Full details have been supplied to the B. and F.U.A., and the secretary will take charge of, and forward to Melbourne, any contributions that may be sent to him.

GOD'S SACRIFICE.

Sir,—The Rev. C. E. Pike draws the attention of your readers, in last week's issue, to some words contained in your report of a sermon of mine, and asks for an explanation of them. The words are "Sacrifice on the part of God is unintelligible." That is not quite what I said; for I would not undertake to say what may or may not be "unintelligible" to others. My words were—"I must confess myself wholly unable to think of God in such a way as to make the idea of sacrifice on His part intelligible, let alone sublime."

Mr. Pike believes that the life of God is perpetual sacrifice. If I were to be convinced of the truth of that, I could no longer maintain my faith and trust in God. As Mr. Pike asks me the question, I will try, with your permission, to indicate the grounds for the opinion I have expressed. I believe that God is love; and I think of His love as a radiant energy of goodness, going forth from Him in measureless abundance. This radiant energy of goodness is felt in human souls, and becomes the inspiration of all goodness and love in the lives of men. It is the purifying and redeeming power in the world, and it must ever contend against the selfishness, ignorance, weakness, and all other human imperfections. These are the cause of all the tragedy of life; it is because of them that, in human relationships, love involves suffering and sacrifice. He who would spend himself for the love of his fellow-men must suffer, and give himself as a sacrifice. But why? Not because suffering and sacrifice are of the essence of love; but because in a human soul the energy of love, though divine, is yet limited in amount, and restricted in range, by the fact of its proceeding from a human soul. But it is otherwise with God.

The radiant energy of love is, in Him, infinite in amount, all powerful and all pervading; and to its steadfast pressure (so to speak) the resistance of human selfishness and sin, though it seem great to mortal minds, can make no real barrier, can give occasion neither for anxiety, nor suffering nor sacrifice on the part of God. These are not of the essence of love, but the accompaniments of its exercise in human relations by human souls. But God, in the "calm and deep peace" of eternal wisdom and power, knows that all is well. The radiant energy of His love goes forth through all His universe, and to every living soul, bringing light into darkness which dims not His own glory, giving strength in weakness which is not His, comfort in sorrow and help in temptation, though He neither sorrows nor is tempted, giving the inspiration of faith to all brave souls who strive for Him in the world, though for Him there be no conflict and no victory.

I may be wholly in error in so thinking about God; but such is my belief, and to associate the idea of sacrifice with God seems to me to involve a contradiction in terms. Far be it from me to dogmatise on such a theme. I have only tried to show why the idea of sacrifice on the part of God was to me unintelligible.

Stand, Manchester, April 15.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—On Thursday week the usual week-evening service was conducted by Mr. H. Fisher Short, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, and an address on "My People, My Country, My Religion" was given by Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Poona, the Indian student at present at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Shinde spoke with remarkable ease for an hour, and his address, touching upon the progress of religious thought in India, made a deep impression.

Aberystwyth.—Readers will notice an announcement that Sunday evening services are to be held here during the current University Term. This effort is largely the outcome of a spirit reborn by the recent preaching here of Dr. Stopford Brooke, amongst a few Unitarian students, the experiment being rendered possible by a resident lending his library, free of all cost, and helping in many ways. Two services will be in Welsh, six in English, and twice the Lord's Supper will be administered. Some four friends will preach, and no financial aids or grants are asked for. Mr. J. Park Davies, who is acting as hon. secretary, and to whom all correspondence on the subject may be addressed, says: "We mean to try, and either succeed or fail."

London: Highgate.—Last Sunday boxes, on which were printed the words "Communications for the Minister and Officers of the Church," were placed in the vestibule of the church for the first time. The "communications" consisted of 6s. 1d. in loose coin, and a note from two members of the Church of England, expressing their appreciation of the services, and the hope that they may be more definitely connected with the church, and enclosing a subscription of three guineas.

Lampeter.—In a short report of Mr. Bowie's sermon at Lampeter on 6th inst., the Welsh Gazette has the following comment:—"It is likely that the preacher's sermon, especially when he dwelt on the redemption of man by Christ's ability to influence man with the consciousness that some atom of good remained in the worst of mortals which, by perseverance, could be fanned into a flame and flourish, seemed strange to some present, who always connected the redemption and the atonement with the blood of Christ. It was evident that many who held exaggerated notions of Unitarians and Unitarianism were surprised at the reverend gentleman's reverence in Christ and his sufferings, and his unbounded admiration for the Lover of Man—the Man of Sorrows."

London: Brixton.—The scholars of the Sunday-school, with the assistance of several friends, have given two concerts in aid of the funds of Winifred House. A children's operetta formed part of the programme, and was excellently performed. Great credit is due to all concerned, especially to Miss Burridge and Miss Abraham for their services. Nearly £8 were obtained for the good cause. On Sunday afternoon last, at the conclusion of the children's anniversary service, a silver tea and coffee service was presented to Miss Burridge, in view of her approaching marriage. The presentation was made on behalf of the congregation by the treasurer, Mr. Nettlefold, who spoke in the warmest terms of Miss Burridge's labour for the school and church, and expressed the sincere wishes of all for her happiness in the future. The Rev. F. W. Stanley and Mr. W. H. Abraham, afternoon superintendent, spoke of the general regret at her loss, and added their hope for her welfare. Two of the youngest girls presented an egg-stand on behalf of the scholars. The kind feeling displayed was highly appreciated by Miss Burridge, who affectionately greeted the children as they left the building.

Oxford.—Anniversary services in commemoration of the opening of the Church of the Divine Love four years ago, were held on Sunday, April 6. There were good congregations, which listened with marked attention to thoughtful and impressive sermons on "What is Worship?" and "What is Christianity?" preached by the Rev. Arthur Ryland, of Stratford-on-Avon.

Pentre: South Wales.—Our anniversary services were held on Sunday, April 13, when the Rev. J. Davies, Alltyplaca, preached morning, afternoon, and evening. Mr. Thomas Edwards, a layman, conducted the devotional service in the evening. Our pastor also delivered an English sermon at six. We were very pleased to see so many scattered sheep of the Unitarian fold come together from distant parts of the Rhondda and the adjoining valleys. The weather was magnificent, the services inspiring, and the congregations in the afternoon and evening filled the chapel.

Stockport.—On Thursday, March 20, Mr. John Harwood gave a recital in the Mechanics' Institute of his original adaptation of Dickens's "Cricket on the Hearth," for the benefit of the church repair and decoration fund. The hall was well filled, and the recital was thoroughly enjoyed. The chair was taken by the Mayor of the town, and the proceeds, after deducting all expenses, amounted to nearly £20. On Monday, April 7, the annual meeting of the congregation was held, at which there was a better attendance than usual. Mr. Leonard New, the senior warden, presided at the beginning of the meeting, his place afterwards being taken by Mr. J. F. Spedding, the junior warden. After the vestry had been elected for another year, and votes of thanks had been passed to the treasurer, Mr. J. G. Johnson, J.P.; the secretary, Mr. R. T. Heys; the choirmaster, Mr. O. E. Heys; the Ladies' Auxiliary and the auditors—the minister, the Rev. B. C. Constable, gave his annual pastoral address, in which he reviewed the work of the year, making special reference to the very successful way in which the church and schoolroom had been repaired and redecorated; to the Sale of Work, which had produced £50; and to the successful recital so generously given by Mr. John Harwood for the benefit of the repair and decoration fund. He reminded the meeting that all these things were only means to an end, that end being the nourishment of the Better Life through the regular Sunday services. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Peter Peirce for drawing out specifications, &c., and superintending the contractor's work connected with the repairs; and also to Mr. John Harwood for his recital. The delegates to the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire—Mr. J. F. Spedding and Mr. J. W. Wells—gave interesting reports, and were reappointed. Owing to the heavy expenditure of the year, the balance-sheet showed a considerable deficit, and the treasurer appealed to all to do their utmost to wipe off the deficit, and to maintain successfully the church which their forefathers had founded. The meeting was generally felt to have been interesting and successful.

Tavistock.—The quarterly conference of Unitarian Ministers of Devon was held here "last week" [day not mentioned in report furnished.—Ed. Inq.]. General Jacob, who presided, said that to Unitarians it was a matter of great amusement to find teaching for which they had been condemned, for which they had even been denied the right to call themselves Christians, taught from orthodox pulpits with the greatest approval on the part of the hearers. The preface of the "New Evangelical Catechism" declared its language to be as "many-sided as that of Scripture itself." Why profess agreement when it was only verbal and not real? Mr. Phelps (student Manchester College, Oxford) drew attention to many proofs in support of the Chairman's remarks, furnished by "The Encyclopædia Biblica," where the articles on the Gospels and Jesus Christ might have been written by Unitarians themselves. The Rev. Jeffery Worthington endorsed the opinions already expressed, and said he knew a clergyman whose conversation showed him to be a Unitarian, though he did not know it; that clergyman held, in the West of England, a living of £900 a year. (Laughter.) The Revs. J. M. Connell and A. Lancaster also gave addresses, and a vote of thanks to the Chairman and hosts for the day, proposed by the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, was cordially given. The Rev. J. Barron opened and closed the meeting with prayer.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

Society for the Abolition of Vivisection

In the Journal of Physiology, February, 1899, under the title "The Kidney and Metabolism," the Professor Superintendent of the Brown Institution, 149, Wandsworth-road, South Lambeth, S.W., describes the results of the removal of large portions of the kidneys of 49 living dogs. The object of the experiments was to discover how the animals could sustain life, and for how long, with portions of their kidneys cut out from time to time. The anæsthesia legally required in the initial operation having passed off, the dogs were kept for observation in chambers, the floors of which were composed of glazed earthenware and the sides of glass. One dog died on the fourth day, and another on the sixth, from loss of blood; one died 36 days after the operation. In one who survived the first operation 63 days, the pelvis of the kidney was found to be full of stones. One died from shock, the operation in this case consisted in cutting a wedge out of the second kidney. In 14 cases the second operation was the removal of the entire kidney from the opposite side; after which the average duration of life was from two to three weeks, the animals becoming extremely emaciated and so weak as to be unable to stand, with ulcerated sores on the lip and cheek. In some cases more than two operations were performed on the same animal. Two puppies were experimented upon, both survived the operation four months.

Contributions to the Society will be gratefully acknowledged. Cheques should be made payable to the Society, and crossed Lloyd's Bank.

Some Extracts from Press Notices.

Chester Courant—

. . . To Nonconformists the work will possess a peculiar charm, but it has also a considerable interest on account of its historical worth. . . . Many interesting manuscripts which have hitherto never seen the light of print enhance the value of the book. . . . The book is nicely illustrated, and a credit to author and publishers. . . .

Inquirer—

. . . It is a book rich in old Nonconformist lore, containing much original matter now for the first time published from the old MSS., and there are a number of interesting illustrations. . . .

Christian Commonwealth—

. . . Mr. Roberts has done his work in the most thorough and conscientious manner. . . .

Manchester Guardian—

The value, which is considerable, of this book is to be found in the rich store of original documents which Mr. Roberts has been able to print for the first time. . . .

Liverpool Courier—

. . . We would particularly record our gratitude for Chapter IV., which consists of an account from the pen of Matthew Henry himself, of his Chester ministry, written tersely and sincerely. It calls up the modes of thought and worship of a Nonconforming people in troublous and uncertain days, and shows them in a very good light indeed.

Christian Life—

This book deserves a place in all historical collections, and should be read by all Dissenters. . . .

Leicester Chronicle—

. . . A study of the pages shows what we owe to our ancestors, and it should also stimulate us to continue their work until religious freedom is completed in religious equality. . . .

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE resolution imposing the Chancellor of the Exchequer's new duty on imported corn and on flour and meal was passed on Tuesday, after the debate had been closured, by a majority of 86, but not without the strongest protests from the Liberal side of the House, and much spoken and unspoken dissatisfaction on the other side. The pressure of the new tax must fall hardest on the poorest of the poor, and the price of bread has, in fact, already gone up. The exhaustive inquiries of Mr. Charles Booth in London, and Mr. Rowntree in York, have shown conclusively how many families there are in our large towns living habitually on the border of starvation, to whom such a rise in price can only mean fresh privation. These people have no margin of income for anything but the barest necessities of existence, and any extra expense must come out of the food-money. And if, as one of Mr. Rowntree's women said, in reply to a question as to what happened when any extra expense arose, "I never let Smith suffer—'e 'as to go to work, and must be kept up, yer know!" then it is the women and children who will feel the added pinch. Surely it would be better that we should have more pennies on the Income-tax, and go short ourselves, rather than do this cruel thing.

ON Wednesday, St. George's Day, the commemoration of Shakespeare's birth and death was duly observed at Stratford-on-Avon, and a meeting was held in London at Clifford's Inn, in support of a movement for a Shakespeare memorial in the metropolis. Mr. Frederic Harrison, who presided, said that they were met on the day possibly of the birth and certainly of the death of their great poet, and that if anybody mentioned the name of Bacon he would be dealt with according to law. An article on Shakespeare as "Our National Poet" will be found in another column.

WITH the April number of the Morley College Magazine is issued a special supplement devoted to the memory of the late Miss C. A. Martineau, for ten years Principal of the College. The supplement includes the address given by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed at the memorial service held in the College, and the obituary notice, which he contributed to THE INQUIRER. Also the memorial article, by Mr. F. W. Black, B.A., which appeared in the March number of the magazine, and a large number of tributes from various workers in the College, showing how deeply Miss Martineau's influence was felt, and what inspiration her example and friendship brought to many, for true unselfish work. There are also, on a separate sheet, a full-page portrait and pictures of Miss Martineau's country house at Walsham-le-Willows, and of the garden of "The Walnuts" at Maidenhead. This number, with the special supplement, is to be had for 3d. at the Morley Memorial College, Waterloo Bridge-road, S.E.

Unity, looking across from Chicago to Boston on April 3, and joining warmly in the celebration of Dr. Edward Everett Hale's eightieth birthday, quotes the following characteristic lines of his :—

And I?
Is there some desert or some pathless sea
Where Thou, Good God of angels, wilt send me?
Some oak for me to rend; some sod,
Some rock for me to break;
Some handful of His corn to take
And scatter far afield,
Till it, in turn, shall yield
Its hundredfold
Of grains of gold
To feed the waiting children of my God?
Show me the desert, Father, or the sea—
Is it Thine enterprise? Great God, send me.
And though this body lie where ocean rolls,
Count me among all Faithful Souls.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

An account of the birthday celebrations we must again postpone for another week.

THE annual meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society was held on Friday week, at the Society's offices, 55, New Broad-street. The President of the Society, Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., G.C.M.G., occupied the chair. The annual report showed that the Society had actively pursued the agitation for the abolition of all forms of slavery, and that its work during the past year had been almost entirely concerned with the continent of Africa. The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and the re-election of officers, pointed out that though the work of the Society must be necessarily slow, it had met with encouraging results in the past, and progress was still being made. He was quite sure that the great heart and the democracy of England would not stand the maintenance of any system of slavery in any country under the government or protection of this Empire. They must not relax their efforts until the British Empire was free from the stain of slavery. The motion was seconded by Dr. Wm. Wilson, who spoke from personal experience of the benefits that had resulted from the abolition of slavery in Madagascar. The Bishop of Uganda moved a resolution congratulating the Government on the completion of the Uganda railway, and deeply regretting that the Government had taken no further steps to abolish the status of slavery in the coast territories of the East African Protectorate in pursuance of the promise given in June, 1897. The Bishop gave a valuable address in which he described the wonderful development of Uganda, and made the gratifying announcement that at the present time slavery did not exist in that country, as far as the public recognition of it was concerned. He paid an eloquent tribute to the excellent services rendered by the Society in the past and urged them to continue their useful and necessary work. Mr. W. Carey Morgan, Miss E. Hutchinson (a missionary from Pemba, who described the satisfactory results that had followed the emancipation of slaves in that island), Mr. W. A. Albright, Mr. R. N. Shore, and Mr. J. G. Alexander, also addressed the meeting.

THE Committee of the National Education Association (Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C.) in a report on the Government's Education Bill draws the following conclusions :—

Popular Control Essential.—The whole purport of the Bill seems to be destructive of the existing systems of popular control and democratic self-government in education and the substitution of schools and colleges maintained at the public expense but managed and controlled in denominational interests. The new authorities foreshadowed by the Bill are removed from the influence of general public opinion, and especially of those who have to gain or suffer by the educational efficiency of their work. They can neither elicit popular interest nor be responsive to the popular will.

Parliament should Prescribe the Constitution.—There is no need for the separate treatment of each locality by schemes. In regard to all the most important public local authorities (from Parish Councils upwards) Parliament has had no serious difficulty in prescribing a uniform system with sufficient elasticity in minor details to cover all variations of local conditions. There is no reason why Parliament should be asked to debate separately different "provisional orders" for hundreds of separate localities. It is a practical impossibility.

Direct Election.—The Bill, whilst professing to merge education with other municipal work in the hands of the municipal councisl, really concedes the case for the establishment of a separate body (ad hoc) for educational work and having only educational functions to perform. All municipal bodies, the House of Commons, and especially the School Boards, owe their efficiency to the measure in which they are under the influence of direct election, and these new Education "Committees" should be directly elected by the ratepayers on a democratic franchise.

An Imperative Mandate Required.—The School Boards have been effective agents for educational progress, because they were placed under the strongest statutory compulsion to provide sufficient school accommodation and efficient and suitable instruction for every available scholar who is not otherwise provided for. The whole spirit of this Bill is to relax these compulsions and throw the country back into the position in which it was before 1870, when the education of the people was dependent on the precarious goodwill of persons of higher social position or the self-interested efforts of sectarian organisations. The pressure created by the Act of 1870, so far from being too severe, often proved inadequate, and so far from being relaxed should be strengthened and extended to all grades of education.

Public Schools and Public Management Essential.—Whatever there is of efficiency, suitability and adaptability in the education provided by the School Board system is largely due to the fact that there is a statutory prohibition against the Boards spending public money upon schools which are not absolutely under their own management. The system of subsidising schools under private or sectarian management, which it is now proposed to revive and extend, has always proved to be most costly and ineffective, and productive of religious grievances. It has had a long trial and been a sad and costly failure, and, so far from being extended, it should be with all speed abolished.

The Humane Review for April (Ernest Bell, 6, York-street, Covent Garden. 1s. net. Published quarterly) contains the lecture on "Ruskin as Pioneer," delivered by the Rev. W. J. Jupp at Essex Hall in January. The number opens with a brief article by the Dean of Winchester on "The Ethics of Blood Sports," and has also an article by "Appellant" on the Howard Association. It concludes with a brief note on a sermon by the Rev. Arthur Harvie on Mr. E. Crosby's poem, "Cain," published in a previous number of the Review.

EMPIRE.

"For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it."
"Go in and possess the land."

Go in and possess the land;
  Stand not waiting so long outside
On the barren desert sand.
  The land is wealthy and wide,
And whoever has strength of heart
  May win the inheritance
    God has promised His chosen race;
  Then gird yourself, arm, and advance
    On this glorious dwelling-place
Which for you has been set apart.
  The soil must be fought for and won;
  It is time that the strife were begun.
Go in and possess the land!

Enter in, O man, and possess!
  A vast empire extends its borders
To the edge of your wilderness;
  Arise, then, and slay its warders.
They are only there to be slain,
  To challenge the feeble and mean,
    To drive back the cowardly slave,
  To resist and o'erthrow the unclean;
    For this land must be won by the brave,
Who only are fit to reign.
  Why stand by the guarded gate
  So long, while the day grows late?
Enter in, O man, and possess!

Go in and possess, O man!
  You are claiming a broader field;
You are scorning the narrow span
  Of the realm whose sceptre you wield;
Your soul is arising in might,
  In the glow of Imperial pride,
    And the petty domain of birth
  Which years long has satisfied
    Is only a part of the earth
That your rule should embrace by right.
  It awaits but your conquering sword;
  Up then, in the name of the Lord!
Go in and possess, O man!

You have heard of that land of gold,
  Where the priceless treasures of art,
And wisdom and joy untold,
  May be found by the humble of heart,
Where many a sparkling gem
  Lies hidden in secret nooks
    To be sought for with loving care—
  The diamond-wealth of books,
    And melodies sweet and rare—
To set in your diadem.
  O man, if such riches you prize,
  Shake off this dull sloth, and arise,
And conquer the land of gold.

You have heard of the land of the pure,
  Where tall stainless lilies grow,
Where baseness has ceased to allure,
  And our garments are white as snow.
It lies near the land of beauty,
  And its verdant hillsides slope,
    Mist-wreathed, so far and high
  That the straining vision of hope
    Sees them lose themselves in the sky.
But the sentinels stand on duty,
  And the outposts of sense must be captured
  And bound, ere you stand enraptured
In that country of the pure.

You have heard of the land of faith,
  With the sentinel Doubt keeping guard,
And all the world's sorrow and scath
  To render your task doubly hard.
You know of the land of the true,
  Where neither is falsehood nor fear,
    But sweet lips and hearts without guile;
  Where the look of the eyes is sincere,
    And a blessing from heaven the smile.
These regions fair are for you,
  And well worth the struggle and pain,
  The lordship supreme to attain
Of the countries of truth and of faith.

You were born for the rule of the world;
  Your soul was ordained to expand,
And its banners to stream unfurled
  O'er many a wonderful land.
Stand no longer in doubt outside
  The empire your spirit must sway,
    But hearken to God's great behest;
  Arise in your strength to obey,
    And spread to the east and the west.
The land is wealthy and wide,
  And if of His chosen race,
  Then it is your dwelling-place.
Go in and possess the world!

Theodora Mills.

Birmingham.

Mr. Bailey Saunders will publish immediately through Messrs. Williams and Norgate a reply to some recent criticisms on Professor Harnack's "What is Christianity?" It will be entitled "Professor Harnack and his Oxford Critics." Parts of it were delivered lately as a lecture to the Socratic Society of the University of Birmingham. Messrs. Williams and Norgate also announce for publication at the end of the month a work on "Women's Suffrage," entitled "A Record of the Women's Suffrage Movement in the British Isles," by Helen Blackburn with a large number of portraits and diagrams.

Messrs. T. and T. Clark announce that every article in the fourth volume of "Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible" is now in type and returned for press, and that they hope to publish it the last week of May. This volume includes "Pleroma" to "Zuzim," and in the opinion of the editors it contains some of the most important and finest articles in the entire work. Among such may be mentioned "Prophecy and Prophets," by the late Professor A. B. Davidson; "Priests and Levites," Graf. Baudissin; "Propitiation," "Sabbath," "Son of Man," Canon Driver; "Psalms," Professor W. T. Davison; "Righteousness," Professor Skinner and Professor Stevens; "Sacrifice," Professor W. P. Paterson; "Satan," Professor Whitehouse; "Sin," Canon Bernard; "Solomon," Professor Flint; "Son of God," Professor Sanday; "Tabernacle," "Weights and Measures," Professor A. R. S. Kennedy; "Text (O.T.)," Professor Strack; "Text (N.T.)," Professor Nestle; "Versions," Principal Ll. Bebb; "Writing," Dr. Kenyon.

Sir Alfred C. Lyall, the President for the current year of the Social and Political Education League, will deliver his presidential address in the Botanical Theatre of University College, Gower-street, W.C., on Monday, May 5, at 8.30 p.m. His subject will be "Race and Religion." The Right Hon. Leonard H. Courtney (the retiring president) will preside. Cards of invitation may be obtained on application to the Hon. Sec., Mr. C. E. Hecht, 3, Essex-court, Temple, E.C.

THE ATTRIBUTES OF THE DEITY.

In the Roman creed known as that of the Apostles, as well as in that of Nicaea or Constantinople, belief in "God the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth," is professed as the first article of the Christian faith; and in the symbol called after the name of St. Athanasius, the attributes not only of omnipotence, but also of uncreated, unlimited, and eternal existence (increatus, immensus, aeternus) are predicated of each Person, in succession, of the triune Deity. The question of the personality of God, which is such a critical one at the present day, is complicated by this dogma of the Trinity; and to the doubting mind that asks, "Is God a Person?" the orthodox reply would be—"No. He is three Persons, not one Person," of whom the first alone is self-existent ("made of none; neither created nor begotten"), the second Person being "begotten" by the first, and the third "proceeding" from one [Greek Church] or both [Church of Rome]. Apart from these distinctive subtleties of scholastic metaphysics, the common inheritance of the three great monotheistic religions of the world—Judaism, Christianity, and Islam—with respect to the nature of the divine Being, may be summed up in the ascription to God of absolute power, perfect goodness, and infallible wisdom.

The most obvious proofs of superhuman power are recognised at the very earliest stage of religious thought in the destructive forces of Nature on the one hand, and her reproductive energy on the other. The origin of heaven and earth, the apparent beneficence that produces, sustains, and enriches life, balanced, however, by the seemingly capricious changes to which that beneficence is liable, which may convert a paradise into a desert, and wreck all human happiness at a stroke—these are problems to which imagination, in default of reason, will find some answer that can satisfy the dawning intelligence. The result is some such primitive theology as that of Caliban in Browning's soliloquy*, in which the Supreme Being is but a magnified man, of his own unstable type.

God as the Creator of all things has been thought of in much the same way in all ages, other than that of modern science, which has left little scope for any but a figurative interpretation of the psalmist's sublime utterance:—

> By the word of Yahweh were the heavens made:
> And all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.—Psalm xxxiii. 6.

or of the more prosaic imagery of the seer who describes how "on the seventh day," after six days of speech and action, "God finished his work which he had made; and he rested from all his work." (Gen. ii. 3.)

Whether it be the divine fiat or the divine fingers which were believed to have fashioned the material universe once and for ever, the "Cosmos" was in either case regarded as coming into existence by no other means than through the sovereign will and pleasure of a Creator outside that universal frame. Evolution is now generally recognised as the method of creation, quite as much in the past as in the present; and the development of an oak tree from an acorn, or of an ostrich from an egg, is regarded but as one instance of that all-pervading law which has transformed fiery vapours into habitable worlds, spangling the heavens with stars, and giving the earth all its varied features of land and sea, of mountain and of vale, with life adapted to every part of the well-ordered whole. And how vastly has the horizon of our mental vision been expanded by this altered view of heaven and earth, which we owe to astronomical and geological research! "The spacious firmament on high" in its unfathomable depths (for high and low have no separate meaning in the interstellar spaces), infinitely transcends the grandest conception possible to prophet or psalmist, who thought of the sky as of a solid dome above a circular floor,* and of the heavenly bodies as lamps lighted by an angelic host, or a living host themselves.† God, the Creator, is to us an idea far grander, if less clearly grasped, than could ever have moved adoring wonder in the days of old. The immanence of the Deity, in Nature without and in consciousness within,

> Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
> And the round ocean and the living air,
> And the blue sky, and in the mind of man,

this is a faith more sublime than one which could believe in a labouring "demiurge," a faith foreshadowed rather in the religious instinct which recognised God's breath or movement in the wind, His voice in the thunder, and His vesture in the light,‡ crude and materialistic though such primitive conceptions may have been as compared with the "higher pantheism" of Wordsworth's transcendental moods. Ideas of omniscience and of omnipresence were doubtless suggested, in the first instance, by facts of which the senses could take cognisance. "The all-seeing orb of day" and the all-pervading influence of its light and heat were not mere symbols, but "outward and visible signs" of those divine attributes; and, in this connection, as in all others, abstract ideas have been derived from qualities in external nature which appealed to the faculties of sight or sound, of taste, of feeling, or of smell. It was long before the power of God was felt to be as much the mainspring of human effort as of the alien forces of "Nature," the last a phrase which is still often contrasted with "Man" in popular parlance; but to the mind that recognises "thought" itself as something greater than the "objects of all thought," the brain of a Copernicus or a Newton is a more marvellous creation than all the rolling worlds whose mazy movements they unravelled.

With regard to the goodness of God as a feature in the common faith of Christian, Mohammedan, and Jew, it is of importance to note that although nominally, at least, this attribute includes infinite mercy, tenderness, and compassion, yet their universal and impartial sway is more or less limited by "distinguishing grace"—in less technical and pious language, by gross favouritism, whether founded on arbitrary choice, on ancestral merit, or any other extraneous means of acquiring "imputed righteousness." This partiality, so flattering to its soi disant recipients, is, however, traversed by a few exceptional utterances which are the key-notes of liberal religion, such as Acts x. 34 ("God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation," &c.), and 1 John, iv. 16 ("God is love; and he that abideth in love abideth in God," &c.). To reconcile the competing claims of sovereign will on the one hand (hardly to be distinguished from despotic caprice), and of justice on the other, which human hearts require of all whom they revere, theories of subterfuge and chicane have been rife among theologians, as well as theories intended to harmonise that same attribute of justice with a mercy accused of undue leniency towards the guilty. To establish a plausible consistency again between God's omnipotence and His goodness as moral Governor of the Universe, has been a sore problem to minds perplexed with the existence not only of error and suffering, but also with the frequent triumph of wrong against right, with a ruthlessness in the constitution of nature which sometimes seems like deliberate malice, and its culmination in the cruel selfishness of man. The incoherences and positive blemishes in creation, as revealed by modern science, have also weakened long-established views of the Divine wisdom as free from the slightest touch of imperfection at any point of the vast machine, or, as we should now say, at any stage of cosmic evolution. But the language of Oriental adulation is no criterion of true reverence, and such terms as "omnipotent" and "unconditioned" are logically inconsistent with either goodness or wisdom. If reason cannot, without doing violence to sincerity, keep the balance even between the stern teaching of facts and the theories of philosophers or divines, we must be satisfied with turning our attention mainly to that aspect of the Supreme Being with which our religious life has most to do, not as the inscrutable Causa causarum of whom (or of which) philosophers can only speak in paralysing negations, but as the all-embracing Father of spirits with whom we may hold vital communion, as the devout of all ages and of many creeds, have, of their own experience, testified.*

Even among primitive races of the humblest type traces (or shall we rather say adumbrations) of belief in a Supreme Being, "powerful, moral, eternal, omniscient, Father and Judge of men,"† are found amidst the most degrading ideas of animistic deities who may be propitiated by prayers and controlled by spells, subject to all evil passions, the mere ghosts of the dead. These latter, from the very fact of their mutable and manlike nature, are apt to assume a more and more prominent position in the thoughts of their self-seeking and servile worshippers, so as eventually to throw into a dim, mysterious background, or to supersede altogether, the Supreme Being of unimaginable power and wisdom. Even among nations tending towards strict monotheism, like the ancient Israelites, the baser traits of such inferior deities disfigure more or less the sublimer attributes of the Divine Majesty, which, though themselves in strict accordance with human analogies, are yet the highest and noblest features of man exalted to the highest possible degree. As a people advances in moral perception and sensibility, its God partakes of the same improvement, as reflected in human consciousness. The fickle, jealous, and revengeful autocrat becomes patient, constant, impartially benevolent, and, if theoretically omnipotent, yet practically obedient to his own laws of justice, mercy, and loving-kindness. When earthly potentates loved to have their ears tickled with fulsome flatteries, the King of kings and Lord of lords was believed to be equally gratified with abundant and incessant praise. When favours could be obtained from monarchs by judicious bribery, it was natural to think that one's God could be propitiated with presents, which would be valued in proportion to the greatness of the sacrifice. That the Deity should be "pleased" to punish "for his own glory," and refuse to forgive without some adequate quid pro quo, a substitutionary victim for preference, whose innocence would make no difference so long as its life was "precious"—this was a credible hypothesis, and shocked no innate sense of justice when such proceedings were quite in accordance with Court etiquette. Even among the most pious and reverent Jews there seemed no incongruity in saying that God would laugh at the heathen and hold them in derision (Ps. lix. 8), or, on the other hand, that He could overlook or wink at their sins of ignorance (Acts xvii. 30). The highest estimate of the Divine character cannot go beyond that which is most highly esteemed among men, though prophets and preachers may rise above their age and nation in this respect.

Since the exaggeration of a virtue may become a vice, infinite justice may be found to clash with infinite mercy, regard for the universe with regard for the individual; and love may be so freed from all restraints of wholesome severity as to become little better than the short-sighted fondness of a weak parent. Thus it is possible for minds of a different cast to derive from the same confessedly inspired source theological conceptions of a tone and tint almost diametrically opposed. This may be seen again and again in the history of Christian thought, as represented by an Augustine and an Origen, a Calvin and an Arminius. If one acknowledged attribute is unduly pressed, it may and indeed must conflict with others no less important for any clear apprehension of a wise and righteous Governor of the world. A particular Providence which overrides the natural sequences of cause and effect is no less inconsistent with the actual facts of existence than with an impartial administration of almighty power. Neither the doctrine of a subordinate agent of evil who can yet thwart the designs of omnipotent goodness, nor that of a God who is directly or indirectly responsible for all that we call good and evil alike can satisfy the mind which would fain reconcile infinite goodness with the resources of unlimited sovereignty.* Omnipotence itself becomes an unmeaning term, except in relation to opposing forces. Why not confess our ignorance at once, and leave severely alone such "great matters which are too high for us."

The Fatherhood of God, not in a merely genealogical sense as in the verse of the heathen poet quoted by St. Paul ("for we also are his offspring"), but in relation to that fatherly affection which marks his treatment of even the most unworthy of his children, is the grand revelation of the gospel of Jesus, which intimately concerns our personal welfare and the deepest cravings of the human heart, which gave primitive Christianity its triumphant vigour, embracing Jew and Gentile, bond and free in one common fold of brotherhood. The less a modest theology distrusts her own capacity for fathoming such unthinkable and mutually destructive attributes as differentiate divine power from human infirmity, the more gratefully will she cling to that moral and spiritual affinity which enables us to love the Lord our God as the inexhaustible source of all wisdom and goodness, the highest expression of human excellence; hard though it may be to reconcile such anthropotheism with the changeless, impassible Deity of a theology that soars too high, only to reach an abstraction which rouses no emotion more vivifying than that of a bewildering and mysterious awe. The devout soul which holds communion with a God whose power, wisdom, and goodness are imagined after the model of its own limited experience, may, after all, approach nearer to the truth, under an atmosphere of salutary illusion, than the consistent rationalist who refuses to faith what can never be proved by argument.

R. Bruce Boswell.

* "A Being of infinite goodness must hate evil; a Being of infinite wisdom must know how to destroy it; a Being of infinite power must be able to take the necessary steps to that end. Therefore the existence of evil is inconsistent with the existence of such a Being. . . . Infinite power does this include my power of will? If it does, I as a responsible being do not exist, and to punish or reward me would be monstrous. If it does not, the power is not infinite, since it is limited by my will and that of other men. Infinite wisdom: does this include a knowledge of all that shall hereafter come to pass? If it does, free will in man is a purely delusive show, since if the future can be known, it must be governed by rigid invariable law. If it does not, a wisdom uncertain as to the future is not infinite."—(Percy Gardner: "Exploratio Evangelica," pp. 50, 51.)

THE PROGRESS OF DOGMA.*

The Roman and Protestant Churches have differed hitherto chiefly in this respect, that while the latter appealed to Scripture, and Scripture only, as the source of revelation and rule of faith, the former, entirely agreeing as to the divine authority of the Scriptures, asserted the existence of an Apostolic tradition which was no less inspired and consequently of equal obligation and authority. The Roman doctrine was set forth in the Decree of the Council of Trent, which declares that "the truth is contained in the written books and in the unwritten tradition, which having been received by the Apostles, either from the mouth of Christ himself, or from the dictates of the Holy Spirit, were handed down to us." And the Council professes that it "receives and venerates with equal feeling of piety and reverence all the books of the Old and New Testament, and also the traditions as to faith and morals which have been preserved by continuous succession in the Catholic Church."

To the contrary effect the sixth of the thirty-nine articles of the Church of England expresses the doctrine commonly received by all the Reformed Churches in the declaration that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation: so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed as an article of the Faith."

In this all were agreed, that revelation was completed and ended with the Apostles; and the Vatican Council accordingly in 1870, when defining the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, guarded it by the assertion that the Roman Pontiffs had in the past defined only such doctrines as were in accord with Holy Scripture and Apostolic tradition; "for the Holy Spirit was not promised to the successors of St. Peter that they might make known new doctrine, but that they might reverently guard and faithfully expound the revelation given through the Apostles," the depositum fidei, as it is called by theologians.

But the time has now arrived in the process of the seemingly hopeless and endless controversy of Papist and Protestant when on either side there is beginning an appreciation of the forces of the objections brought against it by the other. As Newman pointed out long ago, "Few but will grant that Luther's view of justification had never been stated in words before his time; that his phraseology and his position were novel. It is equally certain that the doctrine of justification defined at Trent was, in some sense, new also." Protestants absolutely fail to prove from the Bible the doctrine of the inspiration and sufficiency of Scripture on which their whole system rests—to say nothing of such minor but very important matters to them as infant baptism and the observance of Sunday. But Roman Catholics, however strenuously they may assert that the whole faith as now taught was held by the Apostles, are hard pressed to bring themselves to believe that Peter and Paul knew by divine inspiration the complete system of Roman doctrine which must to-day be accepted by them as the condition of salvation.

Hence there is growing up on both sides a concession of what we might call the insufficiency of the Apostolic revelation, whether supposed to be contained exclusively in the Scriptures, or in Scripture and tradition alike; and we may look forward to a time coming when the defence of Trinitarian doctrine against all forms of Unitarianism will be founded on the plea that the appeal from the general consent of believers in Scripture to the original documents as they came from the hands of the writers, is not valid—that the full meaning of them is not what the writers intended, but what their words intentionally or otherwise have in course of generations come to convey to believers.

It is this doctrine of evolution in theology which Dr. Orr, Professor of the Free Church College at Glasgow, has, with equal learning and ability, set forth in a course of lectures delivered in America in 1897. "I plant myself here," he said, "on the most modern of all doctrines—the doctrine of evolution, supposed by many to be fatal to the permanence of dogma. There has been evolution of doctrine in the past, and there will be evolution in the future."

And it is from this very fact of evolution that he argues in support o

the commonly accepted doctrines: "The fact that the great Church Creeds are, as we are so often reminded to their disadvantage, the products of historical development is precisely the fact which gives them, to my mind, their peculiar value as witnesses. . . . They represent the 'survival of the fittest' in doctrine under the severest possible strain. Not one of these doctrines but has been hacked and hewn at till, if it had not been founded on God's word, and felt to be true to Christian experience, the breath would have gone out of it long ago. Yet men fling it aside without further ado! It is not explained why, in every other sphere, the surviving product in an evolutionary process should be the fittest, and dogma alone should be an exception."

But the explanation is two-fold and very simple. First survival proves fitness indeed, i.e., a greater adaptability to surrounding conditions; it does not prove essential superiority. That the Hanoverian or brown rat has everywhere supplanted the old black rat, which has now become almost extinct, does not show that the survivor is the superior animal, but simply that it possesses some advantage over the other which enables it to maintain life and multiply its kind more effectively. That the earth-worm has survived through all the ages in which higher forms of life have come to maturity and perished is due not to its excellence but to its fitness to lowliest conditions. So the fact that Trinitarian doctrine triumphed of old to the complete extinction of Arianism, and that Unitarian churches of to-day maintain themselves with difficulty and are an insignificant minority surviving only permissu superiorum, by leave of their rivals, —this proves not that Trinitarianism is true, but that it is a form of belief better adapted to the intellectual conditions which have hitherto prevailed in Europe. So, as the writer would himself admit, the fact that Roman doctrine at one time universally prevailed and has since so successfully held its ground, proves merely its adaptation to certain widespread feelings and requirements.

But this is not all, and even if survival were to be generally accepted as evidence of superiority, exception would have to be made when the struggle for existence was not free. At no time since one writing in the name of Paul condemned Hymenæus and Philetus for daring to assert that the resurrection was a fact in the soul's story, and "past already" for such as had come to the knowledge of the truth, and cautioned Timothy against their doctrine as "a gangrene"—at no time since has there been free course for the natural development of theology. The thoughts of intelligent and inquiring men have been repressed by the terrors of making shipwreck of the faith; and if they dared brave the warnings and threats of the Church, they were still forbidden the free communication necessary to the eliciting of truth. So "the progress of theology" has been forced in one direction and hindered in another; and the result is not a survival of the doctrines which have been tried and found truest, but of those which have been allowed and have proved most useful to the governing powers.

And, indeed, our author is himself quite conscious of this so far as some eight centuries of theological progress are concerned. He traces the development of Christian doctrine to the sixth Ecumenical Council (680 A.D.), in which it was affirmed that "there are two wills and two energies in Christ, the divine and the human;" but observes "that this formula cannot be regarded as either perfect or final." A few pages out of the 350 of which the book consists suffice to carry us over all the years of controversy and construction which intervene between this unsatisfactory development of doctrine and the Reformation. Indeed, he writes that "there is no question from the Protestant standpoint but that the Church from a very early period went seriously astray in its doctrinal and practical apprehension of the method of salvation." And here we, too, are of accord; only that what all Protestants are bound to admit as to certain doctrines which they specially favour or disapprove, we extend still further and assert to have been the case as to doctrines which they call fundamental, and in respect of which we opine that "the Church from a very early period," even from Apostolic times, "went seriously astray."

As to the progress made in our own time it is of deep interest to note the confession, coming from a defender of the orthodox position, that "people would not for the world take upon their lips now the kind of language about the hereafter of the majority of mankind which godly men freely employed in the eighteenth century," and indeed much later—language against which our Unitarian predecessors protested unheard, or heard only to be reviled.

In conclusion, our author looks forward to "a constructive period to follow the present season of criticism and testing the foundations, and then will be witnessed the rearing of a grander and stronger edifice of theology than the ages have yet seen." But on what foundation? "The lines of essential doctrine," we find on the last page of the book, "are by this time well and surely established." Are they? But we look back to the beginning and read that "from the lines laid down in the Trinitarian controversies the Christian Church never has been, probably never will be, dislodged." There is a world of meaning in that "probably." Has it come to this, then, that probably the Trinitarian system is true, possibly not?

There is much of deep interest in the book, though rather as a revelation of present tendencies in orthodox circles than from the purely historic or scientific point of view. It cannot be a real story of progress which omits 800 years from its account. It is like a history of the development of the English Constitution which should trace it from its earliest beginnings to the time of the Conquest, and then, with briefest allusion to the intervening period, from the Revolution to the present time.

But it is comforting and instructive to find ourselves entirely at one with our author, and with so many who in his conclusion will agree with him and with us. "The Church," he writes, "has a more difficult task before it" than that of constructing a new theology "if it is to retain its ascendency over the minds of men. That task is to bring Christianity to bear as an applied power on the life and conditions of society; to set itself as it has never yet done to master the meaning of 'the mind of Christ,' and to achieve the translation of that mind into the whole practical life of the age—into laws, institutions, commerce, literature, art; into domestic, civic, social and political relations; into national and international doings; in this sense to bring in the Kingdom of God among men. I look to the twentieth century to be the era of Christian Ethic even more than of Christian Theology. With God on our side, history behind us, and the unchanging needs of the human heart to appeal to, we need tremble for the future of neither."

Brave, glad words these, which make us love the writer, and long to be allowed to help in this magnificent work to which the churches are beginning at last to awake as their divinest calling.

Charles Hargrove.

AN EDUCATIONAL FREELANCE.*

Mr. Herford presents us with a book of which the interest is at least matched by tantalising qualities; and I must have a frank and friendly grumble at both the translator and the author.

In the first place, the reader is left in doubt whether the whole of the original work has been rendered into English. At intervals he sees lines of asterisks, but he is not told whether they are the author's or the translator's. Curtailment is so frequent in translations that the idea of it is inevitably suggested by the marks. But if it has been resorted to, we ought to have some explanation of the reason and method of it. And if it has not been resorted to, the suspicion of it ought to be made impossible.

Again, a book like this requires a few notes for English readers, but none are given. We are not even informed of the date of the publication of the work in Germany. The effect is irritating. We read that Dr. Haufe's first schoolmaster, though an excellent man, was "in the power of the clergy and the aristocracy; so it is no wonder that the school was in the same condition then as now" (p. 8). We are told that even to-day the Teachers' College is an institution in which one learns something of most subjects, but nothing adequately" (p. 28).

But we are left to guess what period is signified by "now" and "to-day," though ten or twenty years may make much difference. The translator should have relieved the reader of all uncertainty on such a point. But the author himself is also too sparing of dates. He does not even tell us the year of his birth, and not until we reach p. 65 do we get a definite time-point in his career—the year 1876, when he broke off teaching to go to the University.

But there are more serious omissions. Throughout the book there are sweeping denunciations of the German school system. The passages already quoted are of this nature, but here are stronger ones:—"We have a school, to be sure, but no school of the people; an education, but no popular education; a spirit, but no people's spirit" (p. 180). "How can one speak of national education, when the national school is not regulated by the people, when all decrees which reach the schoolroom from the green council-table of the Ministry, are meant not to serve the people, but the noblesse, the parsons, and the millionaires?" (p. 183). These are very grave statements; and the Englishman, accustomed as he is to have German schools held up as models, reads them with wonder. The questions naturally arise—What is the system which is said to serve only the noblesse, the parsons, and the millionaires? How does it compare with ours? Even the average English educationist exclaims—What! is there in Germany nothing whatever to correspond to our popularly-elected School Boards? Intelligent German readers might perhaps be expected to possess this information, at least in outline; but a translator wishing to interest English readers in his foreign author would do well to supply it.

For a translator, however, there is always at least some plausibility in the plea that his business is simply to translate and not to supply a commentary. And so, though thinking it a mistake to apply this principle rigidly in such a case, I pass to consider the value of the book taken as it stands.

The development of a strong and earnest mind, and the history of devoted and self-forgetful effort in such a cause as education, are themes which can never be without interest, and these are the principal themes of Dr. Haufe's autobiographical record. The son of a country doctor—a man of independent character—he was compelled by the straitened circumstances of the family to become an elementary school teacher. His first experiences in this capacity were as pathetic as they were strange. The place was the village of Taubenheim, on the Bohemiam frontier:—

> I had to teach some sixty boys and girls in a small room. Poverty was so deeply stamped on most of their faces that my heart ached; indeed, some of the children were so neglected that I took them up to my attic room and cleaned them. During these operations undreamt of revelations came to me of the home life of these beings, whose parents, themselves neglected, did not trouble themselves about the children whom they had brought into the world. (P. 41.)

The equipment of the school and the method of teaching were as bad as the personal accommodation provided for him:—

> Every sort of appliance was wanting. There was not even a blackboard. The work consisted in pouring religious matters into their heads, with reading, writing, and arithmetic, so far as this could be done mechanically.

Positions of difficulty and hardship were for a long time the almost uniform destiny of Dr. Haufe, for he became possessed by two desires—for freedom from the obligation to teach religious doctrines which he did not believe, and for freedom to teach all subjects according to methods which he deemed rational. These desires prevented him from following any merely conventional course. And in anyone who cares for genuineness, the faithfulness to conviction and the enthusiasm for educational experience and knowledge, which sent Dr. Haufe into many countries as a wandering and often half-starving pedagogue, will excite admiration and sympathy. But it must be confessed that this element of personal heroism in Dr. Haufe's story would have been more attractive if he had written differently concerning the results of his experience and thinking. His conclusions regarding the German state control of education may be true or false, and his own methods and theories of teaching may be wise or not wise. My point is that his language as to remedies is not clear enough to enlighten his readers and enable them to judge. Though he devotes much space to these points, especially towards the end of the book, he conveys nothing but general ideas which the reader may accept without feeling himself much further on, though the fervour of the author's language suggests that he has important revelations to make. In England, as in Germany, it is clear that education needs to be put more under democratic control; that it needs to be freed from ecclesiastical domination; and that, as respects methods of teaching, it needs to be brought into harmony with nature.

But the problem is—how? by what particular reforms? It is provoking rather than stimulating to read much passionate denunciation and many glowing promises, without definite proposals for dealing with clearly stated evils and attaining to clearly conceived ends. Perhaps, however, this criticism touches the translator again, rather than the author. For German readers would know Dr. Haufe's other works, in which the kind of exposition here wanting may be supplied. Mr. Herford says, in his Preface—"Dr. Haufe has unfolded his system in a larger treatise, 'Natürliche Erziehung' (Natural Education—not yet translated into English), for which this little book would fain open the way." Why was not the larger treatise translated first? Only those who know it can understand how Dr. Haufe would apply the principle, "Return to Nature," which he preaches only vaguely, though with much iteration, in this record. The principle is now an old one in education as in other matters. But it is worthless as a mere cry. Dr. Haufe himself acknowledges that it has been taught before him by many great writers (p. 191), and what we most want to know of any man who vociferates it is, what new and important applications he can make of it. If "Natural Education" is a valuable work, surely publication in the German order would have been the most valuable way of educating the English public in the author's ideas.

Nevertheless, Mr. Herford's readers will be grateful to him for introducing them to a strong personality and an enthusiast for education; and it is to be hoped that the foreshadowed volume will soon appear to interpret the more tantalising qualities of this and to be interpreted by it.

H. Rawlings.

In religion, as in astronomy, we begin with a complete antagonism between earth and heaven; the stars are exclusively celestial, and those bright luminaries are infinitely more exalted in place and nature than the poor globe we tread on. We end, however, by discovering that this earth also is one of the celestial bodies. It, too, lies in the heavenly region. Lo! we are already amongst the stars! God is here too! The Eternal and the Infinite! behold they are around us!—William Smith in "Thorndale."

OBITUARY.

MR. W. J. BLUNDELL.

Mr. William James Blundell, who passed away last Saturday at the ripe age of eighty-eight, was for forty-six years engaged as a teacher in the Liverpool Institute, originally known as the Mechanics' Institution. Mr. Blundell's father was a non-commissioned officer in the army, his grandmother was a sister of Archdeacon Paley, of the "Evidences." Born in 1813, he was for a short time in the office of the late Thomas Avison, but in 1839 joined the teaching staff of the Mechanics' Institution, and remained, until his retirement in 1885, superintendent of the preparatory department. He gained the esteem of his colleagues, and many generations of boys acknowledged their indebtedness to him. Mr. Blundell was one of those who signed the address presented to Dr. Martineau on his ninetieth birthday by old members of Paradise-street Chapel.

FRAGMENTUM SCRIPTORIS ANONYMI.

. . . I would that we might all be free from pain and disease, being filled with health and strength; and it is good that we should desire the wisdom that cometh from knowledge; and yet show I unto you a more excellent way. Though my body be as sound as a bell, and though sickness be banished from me so that I have forgotten the very name of pain, yet if I have not charity I am as a dead body or as a beast that perisheth. Charity suffereth long and is kind. Charity beareth her own burdens and shifteth them not onto the shoulders of others. Charity seeketh the love and sympathy even of dumb animals, but she desireth not to transfer her own pain and disease to their poor trembling bodies.

Charity defieth the priest of the soul and the priest of the body, and dares the pains of hell for herself and her children, rather than allow even error or ignorance to be overcome by means of the torments of the Inquisition. Charity sacrificeth herself on the altar of love, not others on the altar of science or health. Charity will cut off her own right hand that one of her brethren may enter into the kingdom of heaven; but she will not cut off the little finger of the least of her brethren, that herself and her children may enter in.

And when it was said to her that the way of life and health was through suffering and torture, she answered as the fool speaks among men, but as the wise speak among the children of God: "Then will I and mine house suffer gladly with the saints and martyrs rather than rejoice with the tormentors; and we will bear our own cross and enter into life with Jesus of Nazareth rather than condemn others to the cross and go in to feast with Pilate and Herod."

I cannot but think that the world would be better and brighter if our teachers would dwell on the duty of happiness as well as on the happiness of duty. For we ought to be as cheerful as we can, if only because to be happy ourselves is the most effectual contribution to the happiness of others.—J. Lubbock.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION AND STAMFORD-STREET CHAPEL.

The reports presented last week to the annual meeting of this Mission recorded steady progress in the good work. The treasurer's statement, indeed, showed a deficit of £44 6s. 3d., and the loss sustained by the death of a number of old supporters was also noted, so that the appeal for a larger number of annual subscribers had a special urgency; but this is nothing unusual in the financial position of such progressive work; and such a mission, pointing to what is achieved and what is waiting to be done, on many lines of thoroughly sound religious and social work, can hardly appeal in vain to the members of our community for the necessary funds.

The record of the Provident Bank, which has completed sixteen years of quiet work, is notable. Last year the eight visitors collected £936 2s. 1d. from 1,389 depositors, the largest figures yet attained; and these indicate only a small part of the actual good done by these friendly visitors to the homes of the poor. It is work which can always be extended, if more visitors will volunteer, and it offers natural opportunities for a most useful apprenticeship in work among the people.

Stamford-street Chapel itself has become the centre and the happy home of much beneficent activity, described by the Rev. Frederic Allen in his report. Of the Sunday-school, the Band of Hope and Mercy, the Mothers' Meeting, and the Boys' Own Brigade and other institutions he has much that is interesting and hopeful to say. He tells of the Children's Happy Evenings on Wednesdays, of which Mr. A. H. Biggs is the life and soul, and in connection with which, in addition to games and story-telling, classes are conducted for drawing, sewing, shorthand, kindergarten and typewriting. Drill is also a great feature. And on the same evening at a later hour the Girl's Club and the "Over Thirteen" club for lads meet, the latter also meeting on Fridays. The Young Women's Club, of which Miss H. M. Tayler is secretary, meets on Tuesday evenings, with an average attendance of thirty-nine. Here also classes are held for cookery, chip-carving, painting, singing, dressmaking and fancy work, but best of all is the friendly intercourse between the members and conductors of the club.

On Monday evenings a more general work has been done through the lectures, recitals and music of the Social Institute, and thus throughout the week, no less than through the Sunday services, opportunities are found for the ministrations of a healthy and thoroughly practical religion. "We must work . . . . while it is day" is the church motto, Mr. Allen says, for the year. To other friends desiring to be of service to their brethren, the workers say: "Come, and help."

At the annual meeting on April 17, under the presidency of Mr. John Harrison, the usual resolutions were passed, the vote of sympathy with the Rev. F. Allen and his fellow-workers being moved by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, and seconded by the Rev. F. W. Stanley. Messrs. C. F. Pearson and W. S. Tayler were re-elected hon. treasurers, and Messrs. A. H. Biggs and A. A. Tayler hon. secretaries.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"As he sat at meat, there came a woman having an alabaster box of ointment of spikenard, very precious, and she brake the box and poured it on his head."

Through the centuries has this simple narrative come down to us, recorded, if somewhat differently, by each of the Gospel writers, and bearing everlasting testimony to the woman's love and reverence for her Master.

In Eastern countries especially, it was the custom to anoint those persons whom it was desired to honour, which meant to pour some sweetly-scented oil or ointment upon the head or over the feet.

In Egypt and Syria kings were anointed at the time of their coronation; the Jewish high priest, when he had put on the full priestly dress ready for his sacred office in the Temple, was anointed. The custom, too, was a pleasant and refreshing one in countries where the heat is so much greater than we who live in more northern parts can have any idea of, and where the ground is parched and covered with thick dust because there are such long times when no rain falls. And so, many sweetly-scented ointments were manufactured in these and neighbouring countries; those most richly perfumed, and so most precious, were used when some great and special honour was to be shown, and were kept in gold, silver, or alabaster boxes or flasks, very securely closed so that none of the sweet perfume might be lost.

I said that the story of the woman bringing the ointment of spikenard to Jesus, showed to all generations coming after her her strong love and reverence for him; for was not this spikenard ointment spoken of as "very precious"? It was from plants growing over the hills by the River Ganges, beneath a tropical sun, that it had its rich and beautiful perfume. India was famous for the manufacture of the ointment of spikenard, and thence it was exported to Syria and other countries. It was very costly to buy, one of the most costly gifts that could be purchased at the time in the bazaars of Rome or Jerusalem. And is it not to those we love most, to those whom we wish most to honour, that we bring of our very best, of that which costs us much, if only the gift may be a rich and beautiful one? Such was the gift the woman brought to Jesus!

At the very time of which this story tells, there were among the Jews men who met together to consider how and at what time they might take Jesus and cause him to be put to a cruel death. In them there was no love for his unselfish and beautiful life; they had only thought of him as a powerful earthly king, who would, by wars if needful, deliver their nation from all its troubles.

But since he claimed no such earthly power, they sought to betray the Prince of Peace, and caused him to be crucified.

Now we feel sure that if we had been living at that time in the Holy Land, and had seen Jesus, and had listened to his words, we should like to have gone with the woman bringing her spikenard ointment, "very precious," to anoint him; we should like to have thought of something that we, too, could bring, as rich and beautiful a gift as we were able, with which to honour him.

I think when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men,
How he called little children like lambs to his fold,
I should like to have been with them then.

We feel quite sure that we could not have joined those who not long afterwards in Pilate's Hall cried "Crucify him! Crucify him!" Jesus was only "here among men" for a few short years, but ever since his sacred words were last heard within the courts of the splendid Jewish temple, or in the midst of little children, there have at all times been men and women who have striven to do him honour, who have brought precious gifts to him.

And in what way, do you think, have they tried to honour Jesus, since his death upon the cross, to bring of their best to him?

If you have lost some good friend or teacher who had helped you to be unselfish and good and kind, when the angel of death has taken him far beyond your sight, you like to try to do what he would have wished you to do if he could still have been here; and you feel sure that in this way you are giving of your best to the friend who is gone. And Jesus is most honoured by the keeping of his commandments; and those bring to him the best and most precious gifts who are humbly striving, though it be afar off, to follow in his footsteps.

You remember, in the very early days when there was much cruel persecution of the Christians, how the martyrs, as they were called, rather than deny their Master and say what they knew to be untrue, gave themselves up to be torn to pieces by wild and fierce beasts; thus nobly did they honour Jesus!

And what are the gifts which the children may bring to him? Royal gifts! golden gifts! If when angry feeling are rising, and angry words are very near, they are ready to forgive, not "until seven times, but until seventy times seven;" if through the hours of the day they make sunshine all around them, by keeping Christ's golden rule, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them;" thus can the children honour Jesus; thus can they show their love to him, and bring of their best to him, though he is no longer among men, as in those days long ago, when the woman came bringing the ointment of spikenard "very precious" to anoint him.

To the sorrowful disciples before leaving them to go to his trial and crucifixion, Jesus said, "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

LONDON, APRIL 26, 1902.

A WORK OF TRUE COMPASSION AND OF WISDOM.

To many of our readers, especially in the North of England, the devoted work of Miss MARY DENDY, as a member of the School Board for Manchester, on behalf of feeble-minded children, is already well known; and they will understand the readiness and the warmth of sympathy with which we publish the appeal which follows this article. As Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD has been a pioneer in London in the matter of the special care and training of crippled children in elementary schools, and has opened the way for the great and happy work of beneficence in which the London School Board is now engaged, so in Manchester Miss MARY DENDY has made the even more pathetic need of the children of feeble mind her special care, and has taken the first steps towards meeting a very grave and far-reaching evil, the serious menace of which to the welfare of our social state has hitherto been only very imperfectly recognised.

Last year Miss DENDY read a paper before a meeting of the Economic section of the British Association, on "Feebleness of Mind, Pauperism, and Crime," in which she showed with great clearness and force the nature of the evil which has to be met. Thus the case was stated:—"A chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and the weakest link in the chain of our social life is the mass of mentally feeble persons who live amongst us unguarded and unguided, suffering and helpless, a danger to themselves and to society, and perpetually propagating their species. The time has come when this evil must be dealt with, very tenderly, very kindly, so far as individuals are concerned, but very plainly, very scientifically, so far as society at large is concerned. As, years ago, our nation realised that we had no right to populate a new country with criminals, and ceased to send its convicts abroad, so now we should realise that we have no right to provide for our own future a feeble, helpless, half-witted population. That this is what we are doing at present there is no doubt, seeing that the main cause of feebleness of mind is heredity."

Having described various kinds of mental feebleness in children, Miss DENDY shows how disastrous the result when such children are allowed to go out into the world, uncontrolled by any wise and kindly care:—

Briefly, what happens to a feeble-minded boy—and there are three boys of this type to every two girls—is this, he leaves school quite unable to take care of himself, very often the one wholesome influence of his life ceases with his school days, his parents being very little stronger in mind than himself. Their one idea is to make him earn money for them. He knows no skilled work, and cannot keep a situation if he gets one. He comes upon the streets, sells matches, shoe-laces, papers, and generally ends by turning up in gaol. By this time he has become used to a vagrant life, and as he can only move along the path of the least resistance, and as it is made so much easier for him to go wrong than to go right, he goes wrong persistently and becomes a confirmed criminal. So he grows up through a pitiful and degraded youth to a pitiful and degraded manhood and dies, leaving behind him offspring to carry on the horrible tradition. With the girls the evil, though not more real, is more obvious, and for this reason more attempts have been made to help them than their brothers.

Such hapless ones are indeed short-lived, and if left to themselves their race must long since have died out; but it is too painfully evident that ignorance and wickedness in those who are more robust prevent such a consummation, and the wretched evil continues from generation to generation. Hence the need of such intervention as that for which Miss DENDY pleads.

How she was drawn into this work is told at the conclusion of her British Association paper, and we make no apology for quoting these passages in full:—

My attention was first called to this subject five years ago, when, as a member of the Manchester School Board, I spent a good deal of time in the elementary schools of the city. Noticing the children closely, I found that there were many who were quite incapable of taking in the lessons given in the standards. If I told the class a story, they did not laugh with the others. In the playground they hung listlessly about. In speaking to them I did not think that they responded to what I said, as children usually do. It appeared to me that children such as these passing through the schools, without acquiring either knowledge or the power of self-direction, accounted to a great extent for adults such as that girl of whom I spoke, the daughter of a deaf-mute mother. I began to collect some statistics as a basis for action, and I must own the facts appalled me. First I visited the houses of all the children who were excused school attendance because of mental disability. It was a pitiful business. One boy, a pretty little fellow, was lying in a heap of filthy rags under a kitchen window; he was not dressed. You see, parents such as this child's—often themselves not of normal intellect—do not consider it necessary to dress their children when they know that the school attendance officer will not call they put the little ones to bed and pawn their clothes. Another was brought to me from a bed upstairs. He also was not dressed, and was blinking so from the unaccustomed light that he could not see me. Two brothers, aged twenty-three and fourteen, were also defective, and the mother was not sane. In another house, where was an imbecile boy, I found also his sister, also a slightly deaf feeble-minded woman of about thirty, just confined of her third illegitimate child.

Dr. Shuttleworth kindly read my report on all these cases, and also made notes of what ought to be done with each child. In 1898 there were 100,322 children on the books of the public elementary schools; of these 44,463 were in the Board-schools. I now proceeded to make an inspection of all these Board-school children, and I saw at their work all who were in actual attendance, 39,600. When I saw a child who seemed to me abnormal I made a special examination of it, speaking also to normal children so as to avoid singling out any one for remark. With the aid of an attendance officer, I took down all particulars concerning the child. In this way I made notes on 525 children. This report would, of course, not in itself have been reliable evidence. But when it was complete, we were so fortunate as to secure the help of Dr. Ashby, our great children's doctor, the head physician of our children's hospital, a man whose opinion is acknowledged to be the best possible. He most kindly consented to see all my cases. He examined every child carefully, and gave a written opinion on each. He summarised the result thus:—"Out of 500 examined, 214 were dull and backward (it being understood that the backwardness arose from the child's condition, not from home conditions). 276 were mentally feeble, four were deaf mutes, and six did not appear to be sufficiently behindhand to come under either of these terms."

This means that in Manchester, adding the proportion of children for the Voluntary Schools, we have about 1,000 children who are mentally unsound in the day schools at one time. Since then I have worked in a similar manner through all the Voluntary Schools in a large non-School Board area with similar results. Wherever an attempt has been made to obtain correct statistics, these figures are confirmed. To conclude: prudence, economy and humanity demand that we shall deal with this question rationally. It is possible at an early age to detect the unsound brain. Scientific morality demands that we shall take care that our weak-minded children are always protected, so as to render them harmless to themselves and society.

I will ask you to dwell on these facts:—

Our workhouses and lunatic asylums cannot provide for our derelict population.

Lunacy and imbecility and pauperism are largely on the increase.

Two per cent. at least of our school-going population are in some degree weak-minded. Feebleness of mind is hereditary with an increasing intensity.

Almost all feeble-minded persons are at large, and most become parents.

It would be easy to detain such persons if the detention were commenced in early youth, and they could be kept happy, harmless, and partially self-supporting, for their whole lives.

Thus Miss Dendy indicates what might be done, and in the following letter shows how in her own district a beginning has been made.

APPEAL.

Sir,—I have just been enjoying your last issue and have laid it down with the determination to do what I have often thought of, but had not, up to to-day, made up my mind to. I want, Sir, through your pages, to ask the members of my own denomination to give me money help for a strictly undenominational object. In the name of the Society whose title stands at the head of this paper, I have collected nearly £6,000. In addition, we have a subscription list of nearly £300 and a beautiful plot of land, twenty acres in Cheshire, in the neighbourhood made memorable by Mrs. Gaskell in Cranford. It has not been a light task to collect this money. It has been given in sums, varying from 2d. to £1,000; the 2d. was the gift of a little servant girl, who thought it too small a sum to put into the collection at a meeting and pressed her pennies into my hand. The £1,000 was given by a generous and wealthy woman to whom I went and asked for it. We have had no bazaars or sales of work, or anything of the kind. I have just told my story wherever I got a chance—now to a Sunday class, now in a drawing-room, now in a Mutual Improvement Society.

I remember one of these last, especially. We had been talking about education, and there were forty workingmen present. They asked me to "tell them about the children." I did not ask for money there—but a little later they sent me between six and seven pounds. Last summer the minister of one of the orthodox free churches invited me to take his pulpit and tell his congregation—a wealthy one—my story. He conducted the service. During the following week £126 reached me; then a branch committee was formed and a drawing-room meeting held and another £160 has come in, including many subscriptions. It would take too long to tell you all the unexpected channels that have opened before me as I have pursued this work. In Glasgow a society kindred to our own has been started. I am hoping one will be started for Yorkshire. I am going to York for this next week-end to tell the Archbishop, who "wants to know," and Mrs. Maclagan (who has asked me to go) all about it.

What I want to show, Sir, is this. People will help wherever they know about the question, only because it is true—all we say. And now I am short of some hundreds of pounds. Had I a little more time and strength, I could raise it; but we want this money before June, to pay our builder, and I cannot quite see it.

With our money we have built two beautiful little schools, one for boys and one for girls; they are just ready to be opened. But we have had to build a gardener's cottage, too, and we must have a little money in hand to begin with. We are certified by the Board of Education, and children will be sent to us by the local Education authorities, but they will not pay in advance.

Now, Sir, it goes without saying that a share of this money already collected is from Unitarians, particularly in the neighbourhood of Bolton. When were our people ever backward in helping on a good work? But many of them know nothing of it, and to them I would now appeal.

It would take up too much of your space to give all the reasons for our work—all the reasons why weak-minded persons must be permanently cared for, but to any one who will ask I will send literature telling all about it. Our boys and girls must pass at the age of sixteen into adult schools. So soon as these children's schools are paid for, I must collect the money for those, another £5,000. Our immediate need is for about £500 to pay for our cottage and start our housekeeping. I am sure if your readers could realise how much awful misery may be prevented by caring for only thirty weak-minded children efficiently, they would send us this money. Only think, Sir, these children form 1½ per cent. of our school-going population, and year by year their number must increase unless we stop it at the source. Somewhere we are bound to keep these poor weak brethren, and it is costly as well as cruel to wait until they come to gaol and workhouse. Some day the State will do this work. Meantime, please ask our friends to help us.

Mary Dendy.

My friend the Rev. S. A. Steinthal will be my reference for those who wish for one.

"OUR NATIONAL POET."

What do we mean by calling Shakespeare a national poet—our national poet? Is it that, with national pride, we recognise as our own particular property the poet whose fame is world-wide? Do we mean by "national" our most popular poet—the one poet most generally recognised in our system of national education, most deeply studied by scholars, most frequently illustrated by artists, most widely read, most ardently admired, most universally quoted by all? Is it that Shakespeare's works form for us a national encyclopædia of wisdom, a national dictionary of quotable sayings, a national school for the study of fine English, a national portrait gallery of types drawn from all classes, without favour and without prejudice? Is it because Shakespeare has given to the English a finer and more complete series of historical dramas than is possessed by any other nation? Is it because in our common acknowledgment of Shakespeare as our chief poet, in our common interest in him and all that concerns him, our common admiration for his writings, the English race at home and abroad recognise a bond of sympathy, of unity, of kinship?

It may be all this and yet it is something more. Shakespeare is a national poet—our national poet—not so much because we recognise him as because he recognises us; not so much because the nation recognises the poet as because the poet recognises the nation.

In his English Historical Plays, Shakespeare spoke to his contemporaries, and still speaks to us, not only as his fellowmen, but especially as his fellow-countrymen. He appealed as an Englishman to Englishmen, to individual Englishmen as units in one whole, members of one community, one nation, with one home, speaking one language, sharing common traditions from the past, common responsibilities in the present, and common hopes and ideals for the future.

To Elizabethan and later Englishmen alike he has given a higher conception of these national traditions, national responsibilities, national hopes and ideals. He has strengthened the national sense of unity, encouraged public spirit, and stimulated patriotism. Throughout the English historical plays are scattered allusions to the beauty of England, with warnings and reproaches for those who would devastate her fair fields in war or in any way wrong her inhabitants. A Sovereign's unworthiness, a people's rebellion, are alike disloyalty to England. The evils of civil war are vividly depicted, and the need for union is urged again and again.

This emphasis was of special significance in Elizabethan England, for it was specially appropriate to the circumstances of the day, with the prevailing uneasiness and dread of disunion and civil war at the Queen's death. The spirit of Shakespeare's plea, in spite of the very different circumstances, is just as appropriate and significant in our own day with its competition and party strife. And it is not only in the plea for peace and national unity that these plays may appeal to us. They illustrate many aspects of public life. In King John the prevailing motive is self-interest in private and national affairs. Faulconbridge, whose humour detects motives of self-interest in others, whose honesty admits the same in his own case, and whose latent earnestness is at last stirred by wrong to a child, rises in the course of the play from self-interest to patriotism. In Henry the Fourth Shakespeare places in marked juxtaposition a life of careless pleasure and a life of responsibility, and shows the advance of Prince Hal from the one to the other, till, in Henry the Fifth, we see him as a man indeed—a man and a leader of men.

In contrast to Faulconbridge and Prince Hal there is many "a mounting spirit" of a very different kind, each working harm to England in one direction or another, in greater or less degree, from Jack Cade to Richard of York and Richard of Gloucester.

It is not only to kings and nobles that the Historical Plays may "hold a mirror up to nature." Whilst it may be urged that the people hold too small and the fighting barons too large a place in Shakespeare's picture even for Plantagenet times, the principles illustrated in the life of part of the nation, only apply equally well to national life now in its larger proportions.

Enthusiasm for this island home of ours is the aspect of Shakespeare's patriotism most frequently recognised, whilst the exact nature of this patriotism is less generally understood.

It is worth noticing that some of the most poetical and most frequently quoted speeches about England, this utmost corner of the west, are delivered by the boasters, the self-seekers, and the sentimentalists.

It is a conceited Cloten and his ambitious mother who boast of the security "in our salt-sea girdle" of our isle which stands

As Neptune's Park, ribbed and paled in
With rocks unscalable and roaring waters.

And this mother would poison Imogen to get the kingdom for her son!

It is the coward and braggart Austria, who, promising to support the cause of young Arthur, waxes eloquent over the impregnable natural position of our island with its white-faced shore,

Whose foot spurns back the ocean's roaring tides
And coops from other lands her islanders—
. . . that England, hedged in with the main,
That water-walled bulwark, still secure
And confident from foreign purposes.

And as soon as self-interest points the other way, Austria "ever strong upon the stronger side," joins Arthur's enemies!

Ambitious Bolingbroke, when banished, bids a tender farewell to England—

Sweet soil adieu,
My mother and my nurse;

and he soon returns to stain that "sweet soil" with the blood of his fellow-countrymen in the strife of civil war.

It is the sentimental Richard who, in times of peace, has reduced England to shame, who bathes his hands with delight in the "dear earth" of England, and indulges in eloquent reproach for the rebels who wound the ground with horses' hoofs.

Shakespeare's patriotism, as distinguished from that of his Dramatis Personæ, is always practical in its nature, suggestive of deeds rather than words, of sense rather than sentiment, and it manifests itself in such a way as to foster loyalty rather than personal pride; this distinction being frequently pointed by touches of dramatic irony.

Shakespeare's true Englishmen may or may not be poetical, at any rate they are sincere; and if the poetry is there, it is inspired, as in the case of Gaunt, by the true patriotism that recognises responsibility for England's welfare and honour. Shakespeare is a patriot not a partisan, and the patriotism that he quickens is not so much pride in England's fame as the desire to be true to England for her people's sake.

IN LOVE WITH LIFE.

The coming of spring is even more mysterious than its actual presence. Before a single bud has appeared we become instinctively conscious of the approaching wonder. Some gentle tremor in the blood or subtle prophecy in the brain, or mystic intimation of spirit, told us that God was about to renew the face of our world with this yearly marvel. And now the buds are here, pushing forth their timid leaves, and already covering our hedgerows and woods with cloudy puffs of green. The great miracle of Nature is being performed anew—a miracle not merely of power, but of love, which bird, insect, and beast taste and see with a delirious delight.

Nature tells again of the perpetual miraculousness of the universe, and of the joy of life that runs deliciously sweet through earth's remotest vein. Every bird in the forest has become a "feathered frenzy," singing a wild, thrilling song that sets all the bells of our being in tune. How deeply rooted in the earth is our life! We are Christians that have only to be scratched to be found pagan as of old—thank Heaven!—for we join in the universal ecstacy, throwing open the windows of the soul and flinging wide the doors of the heart to admit the adorable wonder of it all. Who would not "sooner be a pagan suckled in a creed outworn" than miss this dawning splendour of the year?

The most commonplace man among us feels as if the drink of the Druids or the wine of the gods had quickened his pulse. In secret he shyly feels an inward prompting to indite a sonnet, for plain prose seems altogether too inadequate a vehicle for his mood. At the lowest it is a time for experimenting in love-lyrics; at the highest our gladness and gratitude urge us to praise, thanksgiving and adoring worship.

It is not Nature alone that has drained a new life from the inexhaustible fulness of God, but we ourselves. For Springtide is no mere physical or sensuous stimulant whereby only our external pleasures are revived; it is the new birth and resurrection of our inward life. The secret groves of the soul become melodious with a spiritual music, the meadow of our spirit-life becomes touched with fresh youthfulness, bright with the beauty and fragrant with the perfumes of many flowers. Old ideals that we feared had perished in the winter of our soul burst with sudden loveliness from the ground. Old enthusiasms that seemed buried for ever in the bitter dust of disappointment spring from their tomb. Faith that we trembled to think lay dead, flames like a crocus at our feet. All the mad hopes that once allured us burgeon again into being—and all is well, for

The year's at the spring
And day's at the morn,
Morning's at seven:
The hill-side's dew-pearled;
The lark's on the wing;
The snail's on the thorn;
God's in His heaven,
All's right with the world.

And as spring, like Pippa, passes, we feel the breath of a poetic and even divine presence. The Universal Spirit blows a kindlier air and we begin once more to believe—believe in men, in ourselves, in goodness, in all things holy and fair; and with this belief, love, joy and peace enter our hearts. Faith and trust are reborn. God's in His heaven, all's right—or soon will be—with the world. All life seems good: not even man is vile, for we ourselves have become purer, tenderer, more receptive in soul, kinder in judgment, gentler in action, sweeter in manner. The black oppression of war cannot utterly overshadow our joy. The ancient lore of Ecclesiastes tells us that to everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven. Some of us are passing through the winter of our discontent, when the weary weight of all this unintelligible world bears us down almost to the dust. Man's inhumanity to man chills us through and through like an icy wind from the north. But let us not indulge our gloom too covetously. If but for a day, let Nature and Nature's God have free course through every vein of our soul, so that we may join in the old old song "laden with legend and the lore of love,"—

"Lo! the winter is past, the rain is over and gone: the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come."

And then this that is true of Nature will become truer of our own spirit. Happy and guileless as little children, we shall enter into the Kingdom of Love and find the King in His Beauty. We know that He can find us though we seek Him not; but we know, too, that we may wander in His dominions and search for Him. This springtide of earth may become for us a spiritual springtide of the soul. Make the most of what now comes as a new pledge of God's boundless life and love: go forth into the fields and lodge in the villages, and get up early to the vineyards and see whether the vine hath budded and its blossom be open; breathe air as the breath of your being; enjoy, to the last pang, "God's out-of-doors"; but see to it that you walk with Him hidden in your heart, and that you come back to greet your friends with an acquired holiness in your life, a fresh light upon your face, and a new and deeper love in your eyes.

As you contemplate all this foliage bursting into vigorous life, and see bird and beast glad with the ravishment of a natural joy, ask in your heart of hearts that the one and the same God that works and energises through all and in all may fill your soul with a new faith, with ardent enthusiasms and radiant ideals—that, however old you may be in years, you may become again youthful and eager and buoyant in spirit—that the breath of the great Oversoul may awake and come and blow upon the garden of your soul, that its choicest spices may flow to gladden you and all your fellow-men.

There is surely no time in all the year when it is more natural to believe in God and goodness than now. Love of Him bubbles like a well-spring within our hearts. It is easy to feel convinced that He who is the source of Nature's life and loveliness is also the source of all the beautiful hopes and pure ideals that rejuvenate the soul of man. But it is not so easy to fix and treasure that conviction as a pearl of great price, so that no bitterness of disappointment shall ever again dispossess us.

In Him we live and move and have our being. We understand that now because we feel it—because as the sap rushes up through trunk and branch, so His infinite life wells up and surges within our being, nourishing us into brighter, holier life. But shall we still understand it when we no longer feel it with such exhilarating power, when the tide of His Spirit seems withdrawn and we are left disillusioned and apparently leafless and lifeless? Though we, too, are subject to times and tides of the Spirit, we are not left so wholly at the mercy of the law of periodicity and seasonal change as the world of Nature. God's life is ever there for us to draw upon: He giveth power to the faint and to Him there is perpetual access. Thoughts of Him are not our thoughts, but His inspiring messages; love of Him is no emotion of ours, but the joy of His mingling Spirit that awakens to bud and blossom and bloom the graces of our highest life. Our ideals are not projected dreams of our own imagining, but His communicated realities—influxes of Infinite life from Him who is the only Real and True. If we sever these stirrings of God from their source, all our loftiest aspirings will be but airy and frivolous fancies that please the sense, not musings and meditations that sanctify the soul. Let us ever be assured that the high imagination of the poet, the creative beauty that glows in the soul of the artist, the self-forgetting love that burns in the heart of the saviours and saints of the world—that all these, like the flowers of the meadow and the great trees of the forest, are rooted in Infinite life and Eternal love. Our Ideals are God's Reality, and in their essence the very substance of His being. It is He that has made them and not we ourselves: rather it is He who communicates and reveals them to us; it is He who awakens them and makes them blossom "all odour and all bloom" in our consciousness.

By faithfulness, by effort, we may appropriate and assimilate this divine stream of communicated life so that it nourishes and becomes part of the inmost fibre of our being. What was a proffered gift of God becomes an eternal possession of our immortal personality.

As we contemplate this green glory of the spring we must rest entranced in the visible scene only that we may sink still deeper into the pulsing heart that quickens its life and ours, and draw therefrom no mere selfish enjoyment or sensuous gratification, but a great impulse and inspiration to give all that we have received, to share all this blessedness and beauty which is ours, becoming channels of God's life to beautify and bless in turn all who come into communion with us. God sends His sun to shine and His rain to fall on all; He sends clouds and trees, and birds and brooks, and all the beauties of the world to be the ministers of His love. If we cease to be our own, and learn to become His, He may, in the same manner, make us, like them, ambassadors of love and messengers of divine grace.

THE MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

Sir,—It is a perfectly obvious and sufficient answer to the question with which Mr. Colfox begins his letter of last week to say that Mr. Mellor and those who think with him "did not deem it well, any more than did Mr. Colfox, apparently, to count the Conference chickens before they were hatched. In view of well-known historic and palpable facts to the contrary it is rather startling to read, especially from the pen of a man of Mr. Colfox's position in our ranks, of "an irresponsible and non-representative body such as the Conference." That the Conference is "irresponsible to, and non-representative of, the donors and subscribers" to its special fund in every exclusive sense is owing to the simple fact that the donors and subscribers in question, as a mere fraction of the whole, are included in the far larger representative capacity of the Conference in general. Certainly, when I promised and sent my poor guinea to the fund I did not suppose for one moment that I was subscribing to my fellow-subscribers, but to a fund initiated, carried on to financial success by the Conference, and thenceforward to be managed by the Conference itself through its duly chosen representatives, committee, and managers; and if Mr. Colfox and the other subscribers did not regard the matter in the same light they must have been sadly blind to the facts, the principles, and the true analogies of the case. There is no question of "taxation without representation" at all involved here. "Taxation" is out of the question where voluntary subscriptions alone are concerned, and if any voluntary subscriber has been deprived, or threatened with the deprivation, of due representation in connection with the Pension Fund, it is not by the Conference nor by the friends of the Conference, but by the so-called, impertinent, and usurping subscribers' meeting, which, so far from representing the initiators and promoters of the Fund, did not, and could not, even represent the subscribers pure and simple. For the rest, it is a notable fact that Mr. Colfox, having thus raised one or two collateral questions or smaller side issues, takes his place with the other opponents of the position held by "Mr. Mellor and those who think with him." From Mr. J. Cogan Conway to Mr. Colfox and all who are on the same side, there is a unanimous refusal to face the pertinent facts, the logic, and the moral principles that centre in this question of the Ministers' Pension Fund, in its relation to the Conference and the subscribers, in particular, and an equally unanimous resort, for refuge and defence, to vague and indefinite questions as to the name, the place, and the functions of the Conference in general.

Leaving the whole question of the name, long or "short," of the Conference where Mr. Wood and Mr. Leslie Smith so satisfactorily left it in their letters of April 5, let us see what, for the reasons just given, the opposing correspondents say as to the place and function of the Conference in this connection. Mr. J. Cogan Conway takes such refuge as is possible in the bold and unqualified declaration, in his letter of March 29, that the Conference "is not a legislative body, but only deliberative and consultative," and, in your issue of April 5, Mr. Harry Rawson backs up Mr. Conway's contention and gives his benediction to Mr. Conway's letter as a whole; while Mr. Colfox now commends us all to Mr. Rawson's letter of commendation. Now, without questioning the statements made by Mr. Conway and Mr. Rawson as to the original character of the Conference, and without stopping to discuss the fine specimen of obsolete Toryism in their tacit assumption that a living organism must needs continue to be what it was originally supposed by some to be, before anyone could tell what really was in it and what it might become, it is surely rashness in the extreme to say now, after twenty years of conferential experience, not only that the Conference is "not legislative," but also that "any serious attempt to make it so would wreck it"! Meanwhile, with more inward deference than I can put into words, I venture to submit that the precedents which Mr. Harry Rawson brings before us for our guidance in this special case of the Ministers' Pension Fund are by no means admissible. The Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund is not properly a precedent at all, since it was established long years before the National Conference was even heard of, and under totally different conditions. "The example of" the Sustentation Fund, I hold, is one to be shunned, rather than followed, by the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund. Without giving any opinion at all on the actual management of the Sustentation Fund, which is not now in question, it remains a fact that though that Fund was originally a Conference Fund in its initiation and promotion, yet neither the Conference nor our churches nor our ministers as a whole, nor any part of them, have any control whatever over it—that it is a "distinct body," self-elected and perpetuated by self-election. What Mr. Rawson tells us was done in the case of the Sustentation Fund, and what he says "remained for the subscribers and donors" to do in regard to the Pension Fund, I hold remained for the Conference alone to do, in its representative capacity, as the originator and promoter of the Fund to which the subscribers and donors gave their money, and that the Conference alone thus had the right "to settle the trusts, appoint the officers and committee, adopt rules and regulations, and carry on the work."

Whatever the final issue may be, this discussion of the case, whether or not it has led to the particular kind of "elucidation" the Editor looked for, has certainly cleared the air sufficiently well to enable both sides to see where they themselves, relatively and comparatively, are, and where the Ministers' Pension Fund is, in its relation to the Conference on the one hand and the subscribers' usurpations on the other. (1.) We, who are represented in these letters of mine and the kindred letters that have appeared in your columns, object entirely to the National Conference being treated, as the subscribers' gathering treated it, as a mere "debating society," as Lord Chancellor Westbury contemptuously said of the Convocation of the Church of England. (2.) We object to the Conference being reduced to the position of the creator of "distinct bodies" whose business shall be, though thenceforth they are themselves to be in no way under the control of the Conference, to take over those administrative and kindred functions which the Conference is thus audaciously and offensively presumed to be too weak to exercise, though it may do all the preliminary work that leads up to them. (3.) We hold that, without needlessly pledging or forestalling the future in any way, the National Conference should be left perfectly free to develop its own faculties and functions, and to permanently manage, as well as initiate and promote, its own movements, through its own responsible officers and in its own way, subject only to the churches which it duly represents.

Huddersfield, April 15.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

Sir,—The resolution passed by the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association last week is in every respect admirable. It is emphatic, strong, and dignified, and we may hope that the same restraint of language will be maintained when the Bill is under discussion at our Whitsun meetings. There is much in the Bill that appears to me most objectionable and retrogressive, but I deplore the tendency there appears among Nonconformists to rush into a religious war with the Church party before they convince themselves that the Bill cannot be so altered as to make it a fairly satisfactory compromise. More than this we cannot expect, seeing the lack of enthusiasm respecting educational matters that prevails among the people at large and the strong position now occupied by the "voluntary" schools. Within the last week there have been utterances from representative and liberal Churchmen tending to show that they are conscious that the Bill will have to be altered in several important and material respects, and this is the spirit which should and would be fostered by such resolutions as that of the B. and F. Council, but which will undoubtedly be quenched if the Nonconformists give themselves up for war à la outrance.

Now the first thing to do is to try and understand and respect the position of "the enemy," however much we may abominate it. We are apt to forget that secular education without the admixture of theological tenets is looked on by some people as perfectly hateful, and as distinctly worse than no education at all. Well, this seems to us very absurd, and intensely narrow, but there it is, and we have to reckon with it. These people in many places are obliged to pay a School Board rate, and at the same time to support their own schools. To them this appears absolutely unjust. In other places—especially rural parishes the members of the Church of England who happen to be in a good position have spent very large sums in building schools and in maintaining them with the desire to keep out the hateful School Board and its supposed "secular" teaching. That this has been and is sadly antagonistic to education admits of no doubt whatever. The schools are "starved," the teachers are inferior, the Inspectors have to wink at shortcomings which would not be tolerated in Board Schools. The conscience clause in practically inoperative. I say nothing of the impossibility of dissenters being put on the staff of teachers or of the hypocrisy caused by this ostracism—all this is as bad as bad can be from our point of view. Recollect too—and this is a very important factor in forecasting the future—that the lower middle-class and the working-class hardly ever pay anything towards the support of these schools, and that consequently you have in them a tremendous dead weight of opposition to any system of rate-supported schools. It is this immense body of the people in rural districts, who pay nothing towards the schools and who generally care nothing whatever about education, who are really the supporters, although indirectly, of the present voluntary system, and who would throw all their strength into the hands of the Church party if their abstention from so doing was likely to necessitate the heavy rates required for building free schools instead of using those of the Church. Every one who knows anything of the finances of the National school in a country parish knows that the strain on the vicar and the few wealthy people in the parish is now, in their own language, "almost unbearable"; and granting as we must that the motives which prevent them from relieving themselves of this strain by the formation of a School Board are "a little mixed," yet, given their point of view, some of them are greatly to be respected.

Under these conditions I ask myself, what is the best plan of dealing with the Bill before the country? Let us keep in mind that first of all we want greatly to raise the level of education that the children receive, and that this has to be done in the face of apathy on the part of the parents and hostility on the part of a very considerable portion of the middle-class in agricultural districts. Also remember that "the enemy"—if you so term him—is in possession of the buildings, and in many cases is fettered by clauses in the trust deeds of the schools to the effect that "religion according to the tenets of the Established Church of England is to be taught."

Taking all these facts together, I cannot think that educationists are doing well in absolutely rejecting the Bill. By all means insist on the fact that if, by the numerical strength of the Government, the Bill is rushed through in anything like its present form, it will be the first possible duty of the Liberals to repeal its objectionable clauses, and that it cannot in any way be regarded as a settlement of the question—even temporarily — but don't regard it as outside of the pale of consideration; and while the Jingo religionists are fulminating threats of paying no rates and allowing their goods to be seized, let the strongest and coolest among us try to formulate alterations and amendments which would be respectfully and sympathetically considered by liberal Churchmen, many of whom we should find inclined to make concessions which at present are hardly thought of as possible.

It is interesting to note that the Council of the B. and F. support the one authority for both elementary and secondary education; and I judge that they retain an open mind on the election of the local authority. After an experience of twenty-two years on a rural School Board and of about half that time on the Technical Education Committee of a County Council, I have come to the conclusion that abler and more impartial men would be co-opted for educational work from a County Council than would be elected ad hoc by a rural parish, and that religious differences in the former case would have no weight whatever.

Summersbury, Shalford,
April 20.

Sir,—I am instructed to send you the following resolution passed unanimously on Thursday last, with the request that you will publish it in The Inquirer—namely "That we, the General Committee of the East Cheshire Christian Union, representing Unitarian, Free Christian, and kindred churches, emphatically condemn the Education Bill now before Parliament, regarding it as distinctly sectarian in its spirit and intention, and subversive of any true national system of education." GOD'S SACRIFICE.

Sir,—I should like to thank the Rev. R. Travers Herford for his courteous reply to my question. By the omission of a few words the condensed report of his sermon asserted as an unquestionable dogma what Mr. Herford merely stated as his own opinion. That opinion is entitled to respect, and I feel grateful to its author for so clearly stating a view with which I so entirely disagree. "Radiant energy of goodness going forth from"—a being—"in measureless abundance" is to me no more the love of a person for a person than is the sun's light and heat.

I notice that Mr. Herford uses sacrifice and suffering as though they were equivalent terms, but I would remind him that all sacrifice is not suffering any more than all suffering is sacrifice. There are joyful as well as painful sacrifices. I should doubt whether any complete sacrifice for love was ever made in which joy was not the prevailing element.

What is sacrifice?—literally to make sacred; but it has, of course, many other meanings. A general and perfectly legitimate one—Johnson gives it second place—is "to give up for the sake of something else." As such it enters into all human life, and I think, also, into the life of God. I believe the Spiritual Universe is the product of God's self-giving love—spiritual beings have thus been produced, endowed with freedom, with the power of rejecting the love to which they owe their being. In this rejection, with the ignorance, selfishness, weakness, and disease which it involves, lies the tragedy of human life; and to redeem men from its effects, and to reveal His character, and win back their allegiance, God gives His Son, who manifests God in the flesh chiefly by his self-sacrificing love. I cannot believe that the Father whom Jesus reveals is indifferent to the process of redemption, or even that He is unconcerned with a single pang suffered by any sentient creature. He feels with and for all. I believe with Channing that "this whole religion" (Christianity) "expresses an infinite concern of God for the human soul, and teaches that He deems no method too expensive for its recovery and exaltation."

But for exquisite simplicity, wedded to profound truth, I know of nothing on this great subject to compare with the lines, "One Another's Sorrow," by William Blake. I will only quote the last verse, as those who are not familiar with it, and who have not Blake's poems, may find the whole poem unaltered, except by the misplacement of one "it," in "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," No. 788.

Oh, He gives to us His joy,
That our grief He may destroy:
Till our grief is fled and gone
He doth sit by us and moan.

Dr. Martineau calls it "Human Pity: A Pledge of the Divine."

WOLVERHAMPTON EXHIBITION.

Sir.—I should like to say, through the medium of your column, and on behalf of the Committee of Unity Church, Wolverhampton, that the undersigned will be pleased to afford any information they can to Unitarian visitors from a distance to the forthcoming Exhibition, respecting the town, hotels and apartments, and places of interest to visit in the neighbourhood. The Exhibition is to be opened next month by the Duke and Duchess of Connaught and will remain open until November.

It is hoped that Unitarian visitors spending Sunday here will make a point of attending one or both of the services (at 11 a.m. and 6.30. p.m.) in the Iron Schoolroom, Bath Road (near the Exhibition), or later on in the new temporary church, which is to be erected in a few weeks' time on the same piece of land.

Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A (Minister), 25, Copthorne-road (off Penn-road);
Mr. H. E. Perry (Chairman), Whitecliff, Tettenhall;
Mr. W. L. Teasdale (Secretary), 11, Lea-road (off Penn-road).

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—The Rev. John Howard, of Tamworth, who was supplying the Highland-place pulpit on Sunday, gave an interesting address to the Christian Endeavourers of the Old Meeting House on Monday evening.

Ballyclare, co. Antrim (Re-opening Services.—The old Presbyterian Meeting-house, after thorough renovation and practical reconstruction, was re-opened with special services on the afternoons of April 6 and 13, conducted by the Revs. J. C. Street and R. Lyttle respectively. Special music was rendered at both services, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Richardson, of Durham. A sweet-toned little pipe organ has been reconstructed and presented to the church by the minister, the Rev. W. Fielding. Many members of other communions were present at the services, and the collections, with contributions from friends unable to be present, amounted to £64. A bazaar, in June, 1900, realised £250; but the total cost of the reconstruction and furnishing has been £500, so that nearly £200 still remains to be raised. The church, which dates back to 1655, was rebuilt in 1800, but had become so dilapidated that the roof and the whole of the interior fittings had to be removed, and it is practically a new church, with open timber roof, leaded light windows, open benches and a platform with removable desk that has been produced. The surrounding ground has also been levelled, and both drainage and ventilation have been attended to. Contributions towards the remaining debt would be gratefully received by Mr. John Shannon, Chairman of the Building Fund, or the minister, the Rev. W. Fielding.

Blackpool.—The Banks-street congregation have bidden farewell to their secretary, Mr. M. S. Lancaster, at a social meeting, over which the Rev. D. Davis presided. The members of the church and of the Ladies' Sewing Society marked their appreciation of Mr. Lancaster's services by presenting him with a marble timepiece, and the Amateur Dramatic Society presented a framed photograph of the members. Several addresses were given, and Mr. Lancaster warmly acknowledged the kindness of his friends. He has removed to Accrington.

Colne.—The Rev. T. Leyland having resigned his pulpit on account of failing health and eyesight, his charge of the congregation will cease at the end of June next. On Sunday last, at the close of the evening service, the congregation passed a resolution of sympathy for him and Mrs. Leyland in their affliction.

London: George's-row.—Two Sunday evening services have been taken by Mr. Zennosuki Toyosaki, the Japanese student at Manchester College, Oxford. On the first Sunday he gave a history and prospective view of the Unitarian movement in Tokyo, and claimed that liberal religious thought was specially suited to the Japanese mind; and on the second Sunday evening preached an excellent sermon on the subject, "Who is my Neighbour?" He also attended other meetings, and on the Sunday afternoon taught an elder class.

London: Highgate.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. R. H. Greaves delivered an address on "The Ethics of Taxation," and made strong reference to the tax on the bread of the people, and to the unfair manner in which the income-tax bears most heavily upon the "unfortunates whose incomes only amount to £200 or £300 a year." He contended that no taxation is just which is not the expression of the will of the people who must bear the burden, which causes one class, or those engaged in any particular line of business, to pay an undue proportion of the amount that must be raised, or which does not bear with equal weight on every citizen of the country. And he insisted that we ought to demand that not another penny shall be added to the burdens of the poor; that there shall be no indirect taxation which can possibly be avoided on any of the necessities of life; that there shall be no arbitrary line below which there is no taxation, and above which there is a tax which bears most heavily on those who are least able to afford it; but that all incomes shall be taxed proportionately, the lowest assessment being about one penny in the pound, and the highest being far more; and that the same graduated tax shall be imposed on all inheritance save that alone which is devoted wholly to the common good.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione of the Union was held at Gorton on Saturday last, and was attended by over 200 persons. The Committee met to transact business prior to tea. The President, Mr. E. B. Broadrick, was unavoidably absent, and the Rev. Lawrence Scott, the Vice-President, occupied the chair after tea, and delivered an encouraging address on the necessity of Sunday-school work. Mr. J. F. Robinson attended as representative of the Manchester District S.S.A., and was welcomed by the Rev. G. Evans. In reply he gave an interesting and instructive address. A resolution condemning the Education Bill was passed unanimously on the motion of the Rev. W. C. Hall, M.A., in the following terms:—"That we, teachers of the schools of the North Cheshire Unitarian S.S. Union, protest against the Education Bill of the Government. We regard its proposal to further extend and endow the denominational system, as dangerous to effective secular instruction and injurious to unprejudiced and reasonable religious training. We further object to the principle it embodies, of the State-recognition of distinctively sectarian teaching." The following resolution was also passed, on the motion of the Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A.:—"That this meeting of the N.C.U.S.S. Union having heard of the impending retirement of the Rev. Noah Green, of Mottram, from the ministry, desires to express its appreciation of his long and active services in the work of the Union, extending over a period of thirty-two years. It hopes that he may have many years of health in his well-earned rest, and that the Union may still have the benefit of his experience at many future meetings." Mr. Green has been one of the most regular attenders and active workers in the Union; he was for nineteen years the sole Vice-President, and then its President during the year 1896-7. A most interesting musical and dramatic programme was given by the Gorton friends, and at the close a vote of thanks was accorded to them on the motion of the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., seconded by the Rev. W. Harrison, to which Mr. Evans responded. A cordial vote of thanks to the Chairman was accorded on the motion of the Rev. T. R. Elliott, seconded by Mr. W. Lawton. Besides those mentioned, the following ministers were present:—The Revs. W. L. Tucker, M.A., C. E. Oliver, B.A., and A. R. Andreæ, B.A. The gathering altogether was a most successful and enjoyable one.

Portsmouth.—The following resolution was unanimously passed last Sunday evening by the congregation of the High-street Church:—"That thi congregation of Unitarian Christians, while approving of the union of secondary and primary education under one authority, in touch with the representatives of the people, expresses its profound regret that the Education Bill now before Parliament has been marred by the inclusion of reactionary, unjust, and mischievous proposals. It will, if passed into law, hinder the progress of sound education; it greatly increases the pecuniary support already given to denominational schools, it affects all elections of Town and County Councils with the virus of sectarian strife, and perpetuates and intensifies a great injustice upon Nonconformists. Therefore, this congregation pledges itself to oppose the Bill in every possible way."

Rotherham.—On Thursday, April 10 a musical and dramatic entertainment was given in aid of the Sunday-school funds. There was a large audience, and the performance of Mr. and Mrs. Manning and Miss Manning and their friends who assisted them in the entertainment was well received.

South Shields.—Monday's Newcastle Morning Leader contained a good report of a sermon preached on the previous evening by Mr. Thomas Paxton on "The New Thought," showing how much need there was for the revision of old Creeds, if they were really to express the truth of the modern thought of God, and quoting a striking passage from a recent sermon of Canon Cheyne's, as a sign of the dawning of a better day of religious freedom and outspokenness.

One's chiefest duty here below
Is not the seeming great to do,
That the vain world may pause to see;
But in steadfast humility
To walk the common walk, and bear
The thousand things, the trifling care,
In love with wisdom patiently.
Thus each one in his narrow groove
The great world nearer God may move.

FOREST GATE UNITARIAN CHURCH, LONDON, E.

The London District Unitarian Society, besides giving £50 towards the much-needed improvements of the above church, have promised £50 towards discharging the £100 mortgage on the church provided the remaining £50 is paid off by Whitsuntide.

The amount now needed to complete the Improvements and discharge the Church's debts is about £145, of which £50 will be subscribed by the above Society if the balance is promptly forthcoming. Grateful for the help already given, the congregation earnestly appeals to friends who have not hitherto responded, to subscribe, so that they may close the accounts and start the renovated church free of debt.

Welsh Unitarian Twentieth Century Fund.

The Welsh Unitarians are making an earnest effort to raise £3,000, and appeal for help to their friends. The objects are to relieve the heavy burdens of debt on the Chapels at Pentre, Clydach Vale, and Trebanos, and generally to promote the spread of Unitarianism in Wales. The Committee have received an expression of cordial sympathy with these objects from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A full statement, containing the names of the Committee, may be had from the Hon. Sec., Rev. J. Hathren Davies, Cefn Coed, Merthyr Tydfil. Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer, D. J. Jones, Esq., 29, Hirwain-road, Aberdare.

Some Extracts from Press Notices.

Chester Courant—

. . . To Nonconformists the work will possess a peculiar charm, but it has also a considerable interest on account of its historical worth. . . . Many interesting manuscripts which have hitherto never seen the light of print enhance the value of the book. . . . The book is nicely illustrated, and a credit to author and publishers. . . .

Inquirer—

. . . It is a book rich in old Nonconformist lore, containing much original matter now for the first time published from the old MSS., and there are a number of interesting illustrations. . . .

Christian Commonwealth—

. . . Mr. Roberts has done his work in the most thorough and conscientious manner. . . .

Manchester Guardian—

The value, which is considerable, of this book is to be found in the rich store of original documents which Mr. Roberts has been able to print for the first time. . . .

Liverpool Courier—

. . . We would particularly record our gratitude for Chapter IV., which consists of an account, from the pen of Matthew Henry himself, of his Chester ministry, written tersely and sincerely. It calls up the modes of thought and worship of a Nonconforming people in troublous and uncertain days, and shows them in a very good light indeed.

Christian Life—

This book deserves a place in all historical collections, and should be read by all Dissenters. . . .

Leicester Chronicle—

. . . A study of the pages shows what we owe to our ancestors, and it should also stimulate us to continue their work until religious freedom is completed in religious equality. . . .

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

MEMBERS of the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties are asked to note the advertisement as to Assembly Sunday, on May 11. A united act of giving through annual simultaneous collections, if taken in the right spirit, cannot fail to strengthen the sense of unity and common purpose in good work.

THE National Unitarian Temperance Association have prepared an attractive programme for their annual meeting on Friday, May 23. At 4.30 P.M. a conference of Band of Hope workers will be held in the Council Room, Essex Hall, presided over by Mrs. H. S. Solly, at which a paper will be read by the Rev. J. J. Wright on "New Hopes for Temperance Workers," followed by discussion. At 6 P.M. tea will be served, followed by vocal and instrumental selections in the large hall. At the public meeting the chair will be taken at 7 P.M. by Mr. H. G. Chancellor, and among the speakers will be the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. C. Bowie, R. H. Greaves, and Chas. Hargrove. A resolution in favour of the Government Licensing Bill will be submitted to the meeting.

AT the annual assembly of the Baptist Union at Bloomsbury Chapel on Monday, Dr. Alexander Maclaren, who has twice served as President, resigned the chair to the Rev. J. R. Wood, of Upper Holloway, the new President, who devoted his address chiefly to some valuable practical advice to his brother ministers. The tendency nowadays, he said, was to make the ministry less exacting and strenuous, more easy and palatable, but that was to be resisted. The worth of any ministry depended largely on what the minister himself was, as a man; and the President added a salutary word of warning that he must be a man of order, punctual in keeping appointments, as attentive to detail and as hard working as any man of business in his congregation. Ministers were also warned against slothfulness of mind, and, amid the manifold distractions of modern life, the neglect of reading, thought and meditation. Both ministers and congregations were warned against allowing the commercial spirit to dominate their church affairs. It was subsequently announced that the Twentieth Century Fund in payments and promises stood on Monday at £235,134, and a very urgent hope was expressed that the quarter of a million aimed at would be secured during the present week. Alderman George White, M.P., of Norwich, was elected vice-president to succeed next year to the chair. He is well known as a staunch educationalist, and is on the executive of the National Education Association. He moved, and Dr. Clifford seconded, a resolution strongly condemning the Government's Education Bill.

THE second reading debate on the Government's Education Bill will doubtless show what force the opposition to it has gathered since the bearings of its complicated provisions have been fully realised. There was no hesitation about the resolutions of the great meeting of Evangelical Free Churchmen in St. James's Hall, and a special education committee of the Wesleyan Body last week passed a series of resolutions, on the motion of the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, by a majority of forty-nine against twenty-three, condemning the Bill because its Education Committee would be in no sense directly representative of, or responsible to, the ratepayers, because there would be no adequate and representative public management of voluntary schools, because it would not remove the grievances of Nonconformists, and would not increase the efficiency of elementary education. The Methodist Times, referring to the education crisis, writes :—

> If there is time for the friends of civil and religious freedom to explain the real inwardness of a measure bristling with technicalities and obscure details, the Bill will never become law. If it does become law there will never be civic peace until so infamous a law is repealed. No such an attack on the English Dissenters and on religious justice has ever been attempted in modern times. The only excuse for Mr. Balfour and his supporters is that they do not understand the real scope and tendency of their proposals.

A useful pamphlet on "The Education of the People and the Bill of 1902," has been issued by the National Education Association (King and Son, Orchard House, Westminster. 6d.), briefly sketching the conditions of elementary education in this country, showing what are the forces of reaction and the forces of progress, and indicating what should be aimed at to secure a consistent system of national education. A concluding section deals with the question of finance. To the demand of the clerical party for more public money the reply is: "Do not imagine that you will obtain relief by a new law enabling the ratepayers to give you money without taking also the management of the school. For the ratepayers cannot be compelled to levy rates, even when they have the power, and their purse generally is tightly closed unless they are going to spend their money on their own property, for their own benefit, under their own management and control.

IN the April number of the Seed Sower there is an article which ought not to be overlooked. It is a review by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong of Dr. R. F. Horton's book on "The Trinity." Of much of the book, in which the facts of the religious life, known to all spiritually-minded men, are treated with fine insight and beauty of expression, Mr. Armstrong speaks with admiration and gratitude, but is the more astonished to stumble on a piece of "unmitigated mediævalism" in Dr. Horton's explicit belief in a personal devil. Of his exposition of Trinitarian doctrine and consequent criticism of the Unitarian position Mr. Armstrong speaks in the following terms :—

> The basal discourse in this volume, that on "the Trinity" itself, contains two leading representations against both of which I feel bound to enter protest. The one is what I can only refer to as a false representation of Unitarian Christianity; the other is a defective representation of the revelation given by Jesus.
> To begin with the former. Unitarianism, says Dr. Horton, "surrenders the revelation of God in Christianity, to fall back on the revelation of God in Judaism"—(pp. 14, 15). One can only reply that, however honestly made, the statement is untrue. Unitarianism, as exhibited in all its best and most representative writers—Channing, Parker, Martineau, Thom, Beard, and others—insists with every variety of insistence on the revelation of God given by Jesus, the revelation of a Father ever accessible to His children's prayer and full of tenderest care and love for men—a revelation of which Judaism did indeed give the small beginnings, but which Jesus developed into a strength and intensity absolutely unapproached before his day, and of the most transcendent significance to the spiritual progress of mankind. Again, Dr. Horton says that, by the Unitarian method, "God recedes, and in the Christian sense, the sense in which Christianity has taught us to know Him, he is lost"—(pp. 15, 16).

"The vision has gone." Monotheism, unless penetrated by the Trinitarian interpretation, "recognises a transcendent God; away on the horizon or beyond it, He wields His august sceptre, to be reverenced and feared, but hardly to be approached"—(p. 18). Such statements bewilder by their audacity. Has Dr. Horton never read a line of Channing or Parker or Martineau? Yet if he has any acquaintance with them at all, how can he make statements in direct contradiction of the facts, like these? The masters of Unitarianism have been the great expositors of God's Fatherhood. Of Channing even Trinitarians have again and again acknowledged that he recalled the Church to the recognition of the Fatherhood. The very essence of that interpretation of Christianity which is called Unitarian is that it regards the Fatherhood of God as so real, so close, that the human child is able to approach Him and commune with Him and realise his sonship without the aid of any mediator or intercessor whatsoever.

Then follows a vindication of the religion of Jesus from the implications of Dr. Horton's Trinitarian exposition for which we must refer our readers to the pages of the Seed Sower, commending to them especially the concluding sentences of the review.

ON Friday, April 25, the Lees and Raper Lecture was delivered at St. James's Hall, by Mr. J. P. Whittaker, M.P., the subject being the "Economic Aspects of the Temperance Question." Lord Peel presided, and the large hall was filled with an audience which loudly applauded point after point in Mr. Whittaker's masterly lecture, in which he clearly proved that the drinking customs of this country are injuring the people physically, mentally, and morally to an extent not realised by "the man in the street." The lecture will shortly be published, and every true patriot should read it. Canon Wilberforce, Sir Wilfrid Lawson, Mr. T. W. Russell, M.P., and Mr. M'Kinnon Wood, L.C.C., also addressed the meeting. On Monday, April 28, the annual meeting of the National Temperance League was held in the large hall of the City of London School, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair, when well-known workers in the temperance cause, Mr. W. S. Caine, M.P., amongst them, delivered addresses on "The National Value of the Temperance Movement." Mr. Caine referred to the great change in public opinion during the last forty years, and urged all to take a greater interest in the question, and to send the right men to Parliament. He also pointed out how the British artizan was being beaten by the American, because the latter drank less and ate more.

THE May number of the Christian Freeman is to appear under the joint editorship of the Rev. and Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies, of Belfast. Many new features are to be introduced, full particulars of which will be announced immediately.

WE are asked to announce that the office of the South African Women's and Children's Distress Fund has been removed to 32, Bedford Hotel Chambers, Covent Garden, W.C.

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

LONDON SUNDAY-SCHOOL SOCIETY.

MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE ninth Musical Festival of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Saturday, April 26, when seven of the associated schools took part in the afternoon choral competition; and in the evening the forces were united, and with the help of other friends a most admirable concert was given.

The festival was conducted by Mr. John Harrison. The award in the competition was made by Mr. H. Walmsley Little, Mus. Doc. (Oxon.). The President of the Society, the Rev. W. CHYNOWETH POPE, presided.

The test piece sung by each of the competing choirs in turn was Henry Smart's "Evening," while each of the choirs also sang another piece of their own selection. The test piece was sung without accompaniment, at the conclusion a fateful chord being struck on the piano by Mr. Harrison to show how far the voices had kept in tune. The two choirs which headed the list in the award kept perfectly true; one in its eagerness had grown sharp, the others flat. The first regulation for the competition was that "each choir must not exceed twenty, nor be less than sixteen voices. At least two-thirds of the competitors must be under the age of sixteen." The choirs occupied the platform in turn and sang facing the audience. The following are the schools which sent choirs to compete, in the order in which they sang, and with the names of their conductors and their second piece added:—

Brixton: Mrs. Farrow. Rockel's "Welcome Bright Dawn."
Islington (Unity Church): Miss Harris. Schartau's "The Fairy Queen."
Wandsworth: Mr. H. W. James. Mendelssohn's "Greeting."
Stepney: Miss Harris. Welch's "The Ash Grove."
Highgate: Miss Amy Withall. Reinecke's "O Beautiful Violet."
Newington Green: Miss Maud E. Turner. Abt's "Sounds of Evening."
Limehouse: Rev. J. Toye. Seymour's "To a Seagull."

The festival banner, which had been held since last year's competition by Newington-green, was displayed in the hall, and at the close of the evening was handed over to the successful choir.

After tea, the evening's proceedings opened with the singing of the hymn, "Come, Kingdom of our God," in which the audience joined with the united choirs, and the President then called upon the judge to announce his award.

Mr. LITTLE expressed himself as greatly pleased with the singing of all the choirs, the voices were so fresh, and all had evidently done their best. There had been hearty singing in all, and real musical feeling. He added some useful comments on the singing of each of the choirs, and taking every point into consideration, as to tone, expression, pitch, correct enunciation and discipline, he said that two choirs, those of Brixton and Islington, were clearly ahead of the rest, these two, particularly, having kept up the pitch absolutely; and of these two he held that Islington stood first, and to that choir, therefore, his award was made, and they would hold the banner. Certificates of merit were also granted to Islington and Brixton.

Brief addresses were then given by Mr. J. HARRISON, Mr. ION PRITCHARD, and the PRESIDENT, after which the concert, arranged by Mr. Harrison, proceeded. This was the second great feature of the festival, which cannot fail to be of service to the associated schools. The competition itself affords excellent discipline to those taking part in it, and raises the standard of singing in the schools, while in the after-concert the children not only learn what they can do all together, in the part-songs, but have the opportunity of hearing both vocal and instrumental music of a high order from friends who take part with them in the concert.

On Saturday they also greatly enjoyed the recitations of the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. The programme included three part-songs by the united choirs, further strengthened by other voices. Miss Alice Glover contributed two 'cello solos, Herr G. Ammon-Hering violin solos, and Mrs. C. W. Hudson two songs. The encores would have been even more numerous than they were, but for the President's wise suggestion as to the flight of time. The last part-song, Eaton Faning's "Song of the Vikings," accompanied by strings as well as piano, went with great spirit, and brought the programme to a very effective end.

The banner and certificates having been presented, the whole company joined in a closing hymn, and the PRESIDENT pronounced the Benediction.

The Festival was eminently successful, and warm thanks were accorded to all the friends who in various ways had given their help.

LITERATURE.

TWO BOOKS ON COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

THE steady advance of interest in the general history of religion is marked by the appearance of a volume from the pen of Professor Morris Jastrow, jun., entitled "The Study of Religion" in the Contemporary Science Series.* Professor Jastrow's former work on the "Religion of Babylonia and Assyria," in the American series of "Handbooks on the History of Religion," proves his possession of that expert knowledge of an important specific national development outside Biblical limits without which it is not desirable (in our judgment) that general surveys should be attempted. No scholar can bestow over the whole field of the history of religion an equal amount of attention. He cannot know all the languages, or study all the original texts. But it is necessary that he should have passed outside the limitations incidental to one single line of ethnic evolution, and investigated a similar and independent process elsewhere. This demand is triumphantly satisfied by Professor Jastrow's previous work; and the reader will find himself under the leadership of a most accomplished guide. Nor let the titles of adjoining works in the series terrify him; he will not find religion here classed with "Hallucinations and Illusions," or treated as a branch of the "Natural History of Digestion." Professor Jastrow writes throughout with the sympathy and reverence demanded by his great theme

The book is divided into three parts. The first sketches the rise and character of the modern study of religion, and then discusses various classifications of the historical religions, and the definitions of religion suggested by history and philosophy, and, finally, sketches a theory of its origin. In the second part the connections of religion are examined with other branches of mental activity or phases of life, such as ethics, mythology, psychology, history, culture. The "practical aspects" are reserved for the third book, where a sketch is given of the place of the study in universities and colleges (Manchester College, Oxford, not being forgotten), and of the conditions for its effective pursuit. A valuable bibliography, in thirteen sections, naturally arranged to illustrate the preceding chapters, and an excellent index, complete the whole. The bibliography appears to have too many divisions; familiar works on the philosophy of religion are sometimes distributed under unexpected heads; but there can be no doubt that it will be suggestive to the student.

In his general position, Professor Jastrow stands nearest to the late Professor Tiele. That distinguished scholar, however, in the course of twenty years of study, modified some of his earlier views, particularly on the classification of religions' and the criticisms of these changes leads to one of the most original parts of Professor Jastrow's work. He points out that what is really of consequence in judging of the value of a religion is not its theological form, but its relation to life. The distinction between polytheism and monotheism, or that between a community founded like that of Judaism on a sacred law and a (so-called) universal religion like Christianity, is of far less moment than that between religions in which various cults, official and unofficial, exist side by side, and those which attempt to make religion consistently co-extensive with life itself, and set up a single standard for all conduct, public and private (p. 112). To criticise this thesis would require a chapter as long as that in which it is expounded. The idea is a fruitful one, but it seems to need more care in its qualification. For instance, the statement that "in the life of the savage religion plays a comparatively small part" (p. 117) may be true of some savages, but increasing acquaintance with the inner life and thought of the peoples of the lower culture renders it more and more doubtful. The significant thing is to determine in each case what is the character and scope of the influence of religion. How does it touch social life and conduct? No community can continue without some common recognition of social and moral relations. They may not be definitely formulated; but they are there all the same; and the question that is important is how far any definite influence is exerted upon them by the tribal religion. Our belief is that in many such cases there is considerably more conscious connection between religion and life than among people at a much higher stage of culture like the Greeks. At the other end of the scale Professor Jastrow applies his view to some phases of Christianity in the following terms:—

> Christianity, at its origin, represents an attempt to throw off the yoke of legal ordinances and to bring about a correspondence between religion and life through the intellectual force of the religious doctrines of Judaism, but Christianity, too, in the course of its development, falls short of this ideal, and a few centuries after its appearance a compromise is effected between its Judaic phases and the ancient cult of Rome, which conditions its history, until at the time of the Reformation another attempt is made to realise the ideal relationship between religion and life. In our own days we have witnessed in Unitarianism—which appears in different countries under various names—and in Reformed Judaism still another attempt in the same direction, and the Ethical Culture Movement is but one symptom among many of this constant endeavour, among people who have reached higher conceptions of the scope of religion, to realise an ideal which appears indeed to demand an intellectual grasp of the meaning of life for which the masses never have been, and perhaps never will be, entirely fitted.

In Professor Jastrow's view accordingly Judaism and Zoroastrianism are practically raised to the rank hitherto reserved for Buddhism, Christianity and Islam as "universal" religions. None of these three has succeeded in realising its ideal; and not more than one of them ever can. We must not place tendencies, argues Professor Jastrow, on a par with reality. The general effect of the whole argument is perhaps to show the futility of the efforts at classification. The element on which Professor Jastrow really desires to concentrate attention is an element of the permanent essence of all religion. But it is not multiple, and does not therefore admit of classification. It may be more or less explicit, more or less consciously active. When it is adopted as a standard for measurement, all that can be attempted is to arrange the manifestations of religion historically and ethnically in some rude scale of remoteness from or approximation to a moral ideal.

In the "Great Religions of the World,"* we are presented with a series of sketches of the existing condition and actual operation of some of the chief phases of religion. Asia naturally holds the first place. When it is said that Professor H. A. Giles writes of Confucianism, Professor Rhys Davids on Buddhism, Sir A. C. Lyall on Brahmanism, and Sir Lepel Griffin on the teachings of Nanak and their transformation into the religion of the warlike Sikhs, it is plain that a serious effort has been made to obtain the best collaborators possible. One essay, like that on the spread of Islam, is valuable for its statistical information, another for its acquaintance with affairs. Professor Giles writes with intimate knowledge of some of the leading personalities of China, and their relation to national tradition and modern ideas. Sir Alfred Lyall touches no question of Indian thought without delicate observation and the fine insight of a philosophical statesman. The papers of Mr. Frederick Harrison on Positivism, of Dr. Gaster on the Jews, of Dr. Washington Gladden and Cardinal Gibbons on Liberal Christianity and the Roman Church, traverse more familiar ground. Professor Denison Ross adds some valuable touches to our knowledge of Babism, derived from personal intercourse with its followers in Persia. It is a singular indication of the eager welcome accorded to religious novelties in the United States that there are now about 3,000 Babis in America, scattered over the continent, from Boston and New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, to Chicago, Denver, and San Francisco. A Babi merchant was present at the Parliament of Religions at Chicago in 1893, and the faith has taken root. Let no one say beforehand that any soil is unsuited for the sower's word.

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

BIBLIA INNOCENTIUM.†

THE "Biblia Innocentium" is not exactly an expurgated Bible. It leaves on one side many books—such as the Psalms, the Wisdom literature, most of the Prophets, and in the New Testament the Epistles—which any edition of the Bible would include. On the other hand it makes use, in both parts, of apocryphal sources, and adds to the New Testament history some of the more beautiful stories of the saints. But the greater part of both volumes is a fairly close paraphrase of parts of the Hebrew and Christian scriptures.

The value of such a book depends chiefly on the answer to two questions, What is the writer's point of view? and, How does he write?

Mr. Mackail's point of view is frankly uncritical. He makes no distinctions between Biblical documents of very different authority. He draws no line between edifying fiction and authentic history. He shows the neo-Catholic tendency to expand, rather than contract, the area of miracle. The archangel Israfiel, Samson, Jonah, Esther and Mordecai are as real, in his pages, as Jehu or Antiochus. There is nothing to mark out the story of the Seven Sleepers as less well-established than the Crucifixion. He exhibits sacred legend as Lemprière exhibits classical antiquity. Neoptolemus, Nereus and Nero stand on the same level of credit. So do Adam, Azrael, Abraham and Ahab. It is clear that this uncritical method, when extended beyond the covers of the Bible, is likely to discourage the ordinary Protestant parent from putting the book in the hands of his child. The Catholic and high Anglican, on the other hand, whose bibliolatry is less extreme, while his belief in miracle is less narrowly confined, might well prefer Mr. Mackail's book to the English Bible. His child will be invited to believe, on equal terms, all that it contains. A very different use will naturally be made of it by liberal Christians, if they use it at all; and it seems to me that it may help to solve a widely felt difficulty. The Bible is a great storehouse of poetry, wisdom and story, such as no body of civilised men can afford to forget. Yet we cannot use it as a text-book in our Sunday-schools and homes without the risk of teaching for truth what we believe to be error; and the criteria which we apply for our own safety are outside the range of a child's mind.

† "Biblia Innocentium; being the story of God's Chosen People before [Part II., after] the coming of Our Lord Jesus Christ upon Earth." Written anew for children by J. W. Mackail, sometime Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. Longmans, 1897 [Part II., 1901]. Price, Vol. I., 6s.; Vol. II., 5s.

If, however, the "Biblia Innocentium" be presented to the child candidly as a story-book—with some real persons, like King Richard in "Ivanhoe," and some real events, like the Armada in "Westward Ho!" but still a story-book—we seem to escape the difficulty. Our boys and girls will become possessed of a great literary treasure, without selling themselves for it, as their elders did, to a cramping superstition.

Mr. Mackail's English is worthy of all praise. It is just what it should be—simple, clear, sedate, unaffected. This short extract, from Chapter CXXXVI. of the Second Part, may be taken as typical:—

> There lived in the West, in the reign of the three Emperors, the sons of Constantine, a knight named Martin, who was brave and merciful. In a bitter winter, as he rode through the gate of the city of Amiens, he saw a poor man, almost naked, in the cold, and, having no money to give him, he drew his sword, and cutting his own horseman's cloak in two gave one half of it to the poor man to keep him warm. The next night he had a vision in his sleep, for he saw the Lord Jesus Christ in heaven, clad in the half of the cloak that he had given to the poor man, and heard him say to the angels who stood round, "My brother Martin has covered me with this cloak."

THE truest words we ever speak
  Are words of cheer,
Life hath its shade, its valleys deep:
But round our feet the shadows creep
  To prove the sunlight near.
Between the hills the valleys sleep—
  The sun-crowned hills;
And down their sides will they who seek
With hopeful spirit, brave though meek,
  Find gently flowing rills.

A POPULAR LIFE OF HUXLEY.*

NOTHING could be more appropriate than the motto from Matthew Arnold on the title-page of this little book:—

> Who saw life steadily and saw it whole.

Huxley was not only a scientific man, but a thoroughly all-round man, an acute metaphysician, who more than held his own in the discussions of the famous Metaphysical Society; an accomplished linguist, who had a wide knowledge both of ancient and modern literature, and—unlike most scientific men—wrote English in a style which is simply delightful to read; an educational reformer, who could accord no place to speculative theology while he reverenced the pure religion of the heart and life; a Biblical scholar, who routed learned divines like Dr. Wace, and theological laymen like Mr. Gladstone in their own field; a philanthropist, who hated the name and the cant of philanthropy, but said in his old age that if he were to be remembered at all he would rather it should be as "a man who did his best to help the people" than by any other title.

The real student will, of course, always resort to the admirable "Life and Letters" by Mr. Leonard Huxley, but there was room for a popular sketch for the benefit of many who have not access to the larger work, and this is well supplied by Mr. Edward Clodd, himself an accomplished scientific man, a personal friend of Huxley, and the author of an excellent little book entitled "Pioneers of Evolution," of whom the subject of his sketch was the first in time and foremost in fame. It is, of course, largely dependent on the "Life" for its biographical materials, but there are copious illustrations from Huxley's voluminous works which form a connected account of his brilliant scientific career. The book is conveniently classified under the five following heads:—1. The Man; 2. The Discoverer; 3. The Interpreter; 4. The Controversialist; 5. The Constructor. In "The Man" we have a rapid but comprehensive sketch of the main features of Huxley's outward life, which are familiar to most readers. It is interesting to note that at the age of twelve he read such a difficult work as Sir William Hamilton's "Philosophy of the Unconditioned," with the result of stamping in his mind "the strong conviction that on even the most solemn and important of questions men are apt to take cunning phrases for answers." Nevertheless his interest in metaphysics was deep and constant, while he had only scorn for the logomachies of the "pure metaphysicians who attempt to base the theory of knowing upon supposed necessary and universal truths," and maintained that "the roots of every system of philosophy lie deep among the facts of physiology," as the late Dr. W. B. Carpenter also maintained in his treatise on "Mental Physiology." It is interesting to recall the fact that Carlyle's "Sartor Resartus" had powerful influence on Huxley's early life, and led him to know that a deep sense of religion was compatible with an entire absence of theology—a principle which he retained through life.

Huxley was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society at the early age of twenty-six, and for nearly ten years was secretary, and in 1881 president of that society. It is interesting to recall now that the last essay he wrote was a criticism of Mr. Balfour's "Foundations of Belief," quaintly so-called, as the book is a veiled plea for philosophical scepticism. To quote Mr. Clodd's words, "he had to deal with the same vagueness, elusiveness, and want of insight into the position travestied, which is the feature of Mr. Gladstone's polemics, and which make Mr. Balfour the intellectual representative of that master of the art of mystification." Mr. Balfour may take some comfort in being classed with his great master. We cannot resist the temptation to add the following, which is quoted from the "Life and Letters":—

> My estimation of Balfour, as a thinker, sinks lower and lower the farther I go. God help the people who think his book an important contribution to thought! The Gigadibsians [Vide "Bishop Blougram's Apology"] who say so are past divine assistance. I should call him Gigadibsius Optimus Maximus.

All the other sections of this little book are packed full of golden thought and suggest ample matter for comment, and but little for criticism or dissent. Some readers will be surprised to find that Huxley regarded Polemics as "always more or less an evil." But he added most truly, "the lukewarmness which lets error and corruption pursue their baneful course is a greater evil." He was constantly called upon to wage war to the knife in defence of the doctine of Evolution, and there was no place for indifference or compromise. The famous controversy with Mr. Gladstone about the Gadarene demoniacs, suggested to an irreverent observer the remark that it was not edifying to see two old gentlemen fighting about pigs! But the real question at issue was that of submission to an authority claiming supernatural origin, and therefore not to be questioned save at the soul's peril. No competent observer can doubt that Huxley had the best of it in this as in other controversies, but it will shock indiscriminate admirers of the great statesman to find that his opponent spoke of him as "a copious shuffler," characterised by one fatal defect, "utter untrustworthiness." But Gladstone in matters of science was helpless as a child in the hands of Huxley, and in theology avowedly had a "closed mind" on all the great questions in which the Church and the Bible spoke, as he believed, with an authority which was not to be impeached.

Mr. Clodd's little book is invaluable as an introduction to the larger "Life." Even this brief sketch of a great career is sufficient to increase our admiration for one "who never turned his back, but marched breast forward," and "remains alike an example and an inspiration to all men for all time." BUILDING A HOME.*

MESSRS. PARKER AND UNWIN sound their key-note so tersely and forcibly in their opening words that a liberal quotation is the best compliment one can pay them:—

> The way we run in ruts is wonderful; our inability to find out the right principles upon which to set to work to accomplish what we take in hand, or to go to the bottom of things, is simply astonishing; while the resignation with which we accept the Recognised and Usual as the Right and Inevitable is really beautiful.

* "The Art of Building a Home." A collection of lectures and illustrations. By Barry Parker and Raymond Unwin. Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.

In nothing is this tendency more noticeable than in the art of house-building. We begin by considering what, in the way of a house, our neighbours have; what they would expect us to have; what is customary in the rank of life to which we belong; anything, in fact, but what are our actual needs. About the last thing we do is to make our home take just that form which will, in the most straightforward manner, meet our requirements.

It is too often evident that people, instead of being assisted, and their lives added to, by the houses they occupy, are but living as well as may be in spite of them. The house, planned largely to meet wants which never occur, and sacrificed to convention and custom, neither satisfies the real needs of its occupants nor expresses in any way their individuality.

In the opinion of the authors, then, there is a "housing question" not only for the working-classes, but also for other classes. And it is for these other classes chiefly (though not entirely) that they discourse upon principles, and present plans and pictures.

That their preaching is needed no one will doubt who thoughtfully contemplates the dead uniformity of the miles of close-packed houses in our large towns, and the varied ugliness of the majority of interiors. Of course there are two great obstacles to freedom as respects structural variety and adaptation to individual needs—namely, that few people can afford to build for themselves, and that those who build for others must (when not specially commissioned) build for general needs. This latter difficulty is hardly recognised by our authors, but it increases in proportion to the mobility of the population, and mobility seems to be required more and more by modern conditions of life. An ordinary builder must build, not for one tenant only, but for a succession, and it is not surprising that he is reluctant to deviate from ordinary types. Still, even within the limits of ordinary needs, and also within the limits of moderate expense, much improvement in house building and furnishing might take place; and all energetic thinking and unconventional suggestion should be welcomed. "At present," say Messrs. Parker and Unwin, concerning the ordinary architect, "he but too readily accepts the popular idea of art as a thing quite apart from life, a sort of trimming to be added if funds allow. It is this prevalent conception of beauty as a sweetmeat, something rather nice which may be taken or left according to inclination after the solid meal has been secured, which largely causes the lack of comeliness in our houses." Things useful should be made also beautiful—that is their great principle. Things useful may have to be simple, but they can be beautiful for all that. Mere imitations of beautiful details in the work of former days will not serve. "If, instead of copying these features when and where the cause for them does not exist, we would emulate the spirit in which they were produced, there would be more hope of again seeing life and vigour in our architecture and design."

Almost one-third of the book consists of pictured examples of the manner in which the authors have applied their ideas, and very strong is the support thus given to their verbal teaching.

JOHN CHINAMAN.*

THERE seems to be very little doubt in the minds of the majority of English people, that it would certainly be better for Eastern countries if they would adopt more of Western manners and customs. We feel the difference very great that separates the civilisation of China from that of England, France, or America. To us, the people out yonder are all barbarians, and need our Christianity and culture to lift them to anything like respectability. It is not easy for us to see any other view of the matter. Our knowledge is obtained chiefly from reports of missionaries and special newspaper correspondents. But if our notion that the "Chinee" is hopelessly "heathen" be erroneous, as lovers of truth we should be prepared to be put right.

It is, therefore, worth while to turn to some letters which appeared originally in the pages of the Saturday Review, and are now republished with additions in a shilling booklet, as "Letters from John Chinaman," purporting to be written by an intelligent Chinese student, who, by long residence in England, was qualified to judge of our institutions. We may then judge whether our view of Chinese inferiority is correct.

If the writer can be relied on as speaking for the general thought in China, it becomes quite a serious concern for English people to consider whether there is not much we may learn from China; and whether we are not really impertinent in sending out our traders, reformers, and missionaries. The anonymous writer reminds us that it is only when some Chinese mob murders our compatriots that our attention is powerfully drawn to China. But, as the average Englishman would resent his own countrymen being judged by the action of a low English mob, so the intelligent Chinese citizen objects to be measured by the acts of low cold-blooded assassins.

Yet even such outrageous events deserve, we are told, "a consideration more grave, and a less intemperate reprobation, than they have hitherto received among you." These outbursts are claimed to be reasonable and intelligent expressions of profound mistrust and dislike of our civilisation on the part of the Chinese.

The two civilisations have been compared; and the Eastern mind is convinced that his own ideals and methods of life are better for him and his land than ours can ever be. He resists our encroaching civilisation as something which will drag him down from his better and higher position.

In as few words as possible, I should like to indicate the line of argument pursued by the writer.

The Chinese civilisation is the oldest in the world. Although this is not a proof that it is the best, it is a proof that Chinese institutions have guaranteed for the Chinese people a stability for which they search in vain amongst the nations of Europe. Whilst our critic sees in our civilisation an economic chaos, he finds in his own a moral order. He will not maintain that his religion is better than ours, but he declares that his has a greater influence upon society than ours has. "You profess Christianity, but your civilisation has never been Christian; whereas ours is Confucian through and through." The Chinese insist that all their economic doings should be moral, whilst with us our economic relations come first; upon these we afterwards seek to graft as much morality only as they will admit.

We in the West pride ourselves on the fact that we are Progressive, and the Eastern people admit that we are "moving on" and they are not. But they ask whether we are right, or they? For an Englishman or an American to remain all his life in the sphere in which he was born is considered almost a disgrace. Our men must venture, struggle, compete, and win. From this characteristic we get, on the one hand, our immense activity and success in material arts; but, on the other hand, the Chinaman sees our unrest, confusion, and lack of morality. "Among you no one is contented, no one has leisure to live, so intent are all on increasing the means of living. The 'cash-nexus' (to borrow a phrase of one of your own writers) is the only relation you recognise among men."

The Eastern people are content with the character and value of the life lived, and they maintain that we spend all our thought and strength, not to live, but to obtain the means of living. We measure our civilisation by the accumulation of the means of living; they seek but to live. While we are hoarding the means of living the opportunity of living passes by. They see this, and do not want to be like us. Knowing what they do of us, they conclude ours is a "barbarous society." We buy our progress too dear. When the Chinaman is asked to rise and become like the Western people, he asks naturally, "What is the gain?" and, making due study, comes to the conclusion that it would be dreadful to become such as we are. He tells us his people in far-away China are living quietly, cultivating the soil just enough to supply their own wants; he sees us struggling and competing with each other. His people consider the aim of civilisation should be to produce enough to consume and have sufficient energy and leisure to enjoy social intercourse. To need foreign trade would be a source of social demoralisation. He finds that, while competition has sharpened our wits and made us agitated and nervous, and produced many wonderful material things, it has become such a monster that all our legislation cannot control it. The story of our doings in Parliament for the past hundred years tells of "a perpetual and fruitless effort to regulate the disorders of our economic system." We are told that our poor, our drunk, our incompetent, our sick, our aged, ride us like a nightmare. In his own land he finds, as a contrast, that no man is isolated, save by his own fault.

If it is not so easy for him to grow rich as with you, neither is it so easy for him to starve; if he has not the motive to compete, neither has he the temptation to cheat and to oppress. Free at once from the torment of ambition and the apprehension of distress, he has leisure to spare from the acquisition of the means of living for life itself. He has both the instinct and the opportunity to appreciate the gifts of Nature, to cultivate manners, and to enter into humane and disinterested relations with his fellows.

"The Land of the Blue Gown." Mrs. Archibald Little. T. Fisher Unwin. 21s.

The author draws a pretty picture of his own home in a lovely country-place in China, where he and his friends truly commune with nature. We get nothing like his silence and stillness; for our people are accustomed so completely to the rush and bustle of city life. This leads to the conclusion that we cannot write a poem or paint a picture, still less can we worship or aspire. We are divorced from nature and unreclaimed by Art; instructed, but not educated; assimilative, but incapable of thought. We are trained in a religion in which we do not believe; and we dimly conceal under a mask of piety an atheism we are not intelligent enough to avow. Our streets are described as "row upon row of little boxes, one like another, lacking in all that is essential, loaded with all that is superfluous." Our pictures are stories in paint, transcripts of all that is banal. Society is described as a huge engine, and that engine is itself out of gear. Everywhere in these benighted Western lands our Chinese brother finds "means," but has looked in vain to find the "end."

It is well to see ourselves sometimes by the eyes of the people we desire to convert and uplift. We have spent millions of money to persuade these multitudes of the Far East that our ways are better than theirs; but we should certainly be tempted to consider thoroughly the groundwork of any mission going from our shores to bless these people. And we dare not forget that there are thinkers in our own land who are doing all they can to win us back from our all-engrossing money-getting, competitive system, to a saner simpler form of life—which might leave a margin for true contemplation and worship. At the same time even this powerfully-written little work has not persuaded us that Chinese methods surpass our own.

Side by side with this book we have the beautifully illustrated work by Mrs. Archibald Little, entitled "The Land of the Blue Gown," in which we find details of the Chinese custom of foot-binding; and accounts of a long journey the authoress made to persuade the women to abandon the use of bandages, in making the foot tiny and deformed in order to please and fascinate the gentlemen of the land. We cannot help thinking that even our Chinese critic will admit that it would be a good thing for humanity if such a custom were removed from his people. Surely it would also be better for the present Chinese population if the sanitary arrangements of his wonderful land were improved. In this book by Mrs. Little we see many evidences of the need of such reforms. How often the lady complains of the bad odours! A photograph inserted in the volume is silently eloquent on this same subject.

There are many books on the market just now dealing with the great land of China. The strange people are brought very near to us to-day. We are forcing trade within their borders, and many of our customs are being adopted, though their introduction is being resented. The missionary has been there a long time. But in all that we do amongst a people so different from our own, we must consider the attitude natural to, and taken by John Chinaman, at any rate more than we have hitherto done; for the little man with the pig-tail has much to say for himself.

RELIGION V. THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

Sir,—If the Martyr of Calvary could now be questioned, what would be his reply to the following appeal?:—

Do you desire us to go on for ever thinking, talking, writing, praying and weeping about you, discussing whether you were God or Man, or both together, and conjuring up visions of your earthly sufferings at the bidding of our preachers, as the most pious of exercises?

Assuredly the reply of that heroic soul would infallibly be on this wise:—

I desire no such thing. Talk and think less of me, and more of my Father. Bow to His name, not to mine. Sympathise with the sufferings of His creatures now and give your best thoughts to relieve them, not to recall in imagination my day of agony, which twenty centuries of Paradise have almost effaced from my memory.

The Christ we find in the Synoptical Gospels could give no other answer than this to any such question. After all, it is a poor homage to pay to the greatest of prophets (albeit one in accordance with a familiar weakness of human nature), to centre our attention on his person and his spiritual rank, rather than on the lessons which he lived to teach and sealed by martyrdom. Of course for Trinitarians such misplacement of interest is justifiable. If Jesus were indeed Incarnate God—if the Infinite Spirit, the Lord and Life of all the clusters of the suns, was once a human Baby—that stupendous fact (supposing it accepted as a fact) must throw all rational theology into the melting-pot. We can no more conceive of a philosophic theory of religion with such a God, than of a scientific Geometry with a circle occasionally to be found with the properties of a triangle; and while we may still interest ourselves in Euclid's personality, we must abandon any attempt to follow his propositions or demonstrations.

The mission of Christ on the Trinitarian hypothesis was a great deal more and other than that of a Teacher of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. His office as such a Teacher was altogether eclipsed by his revelation of himself (testè St. John) as the Eternal Logos; and his disciples are bound to make Him, rather than his Lessons, the paramount object of their religious interest. He is to them much more than a prophet or teacher, or the greatest historical character of the past. He is their living God; accessible at this hour to their prayers.

But all this is reversed in the case of the Unitarian, who holds the supposed fact of the sometime Babyhood of the Eternal God to be incredible per se—not only (as often stated) as merely miraculous —(i.e., the intervention of supernatural power over a contingent truth), but, in the strict geometric sense, as an absurdity (an interference with a necessary truth, tantamount to the ascription to a circle of the properties of a square or a triangle). To one who thinks thus the perpetual restless discussion of the problems of Christology is waste of time. Our love and reverence for the historical Jesus may be much better shown by living out his Sermon on the Mount than by debating for ever whose son he was. Our concern is to steer our frail barks as best we may to the Haven of Holiness amid the darkness of the seas of doubt and sin over which Christ shone like a Pharos in the night of time. It should not be to row for ever round and round the Lighthouse.

The day has surely come for us to turn from incessant reference to the greatest chapter in the History of Religion to Religion itself; and to apply our thoughts to the building up afresh of theology and ethics on the only bases left for them. The perils of the rapidly approaching moment when the masses must learn that the Bible is no infallible guide to Heaven hereafter or to Duty now on earth, but can only teach us what "holy men of old" thought about such things—that peril is imminent and at our doors. As the authors of the new Contentio Veritatis truly say, this is the real "Crisis in the Church," not trivial questions of Ritual; and it is a tremendous one to face in the interests of Morality and of Piety. The two crutches —the Church and the Bible—on which Christendom has hitherto leaned alternately, have slipped away, and henceforth she must either walk upright on her feet or fall into depths of mire unfathomed. Surely at a turning point like this it behoves the Unitarian Church, which has been foremost in relinquishing the fallacious helps of the past, to step forward and "prepare the way of the Lord" by making plain and straight the paths on which human souls must henceforth tread?

The problems of historical Christianity are the most interesting of all the questions of the Past of humanity, and we are deeply indebted to the learning, the candour and the courage of those who, in these latter years, have solved them more or less completely for us. But they only concern the history of Religion; no longer Religion itself or ethics. No question concerning God, or Immortality, or Duty will henceforth ever be settled finally by reference to a Greek or a Hebrew text. No claim to the latria of Deity can be made good for Jesus of Nazareth from the mystic words of the unknown author of the Fourth Gospel. All this is clear to most of us now, and will be clear to all men before our twentieth century has passed its second decade. Let us, then, in God's name, cease to waste time over the old theological conundrums of which the Athanasian Creed is a storehouse, and turn (not without a prayer for help) to the solution of the problem which lies before humanity now—"How to satisfy the spiritual and moral needs of Man without either an Infallible Book or an Infallible Church."

"AN EDUCATIONAL FREE-LANCE."

Sir,—Grumbling, whether ore rotundo or currente calamo, is so unquestioned a British franchise, that no one feels a right to object. Accepting as "frank and friendly" the remarks of Mr. H. Rawlings on the translation of Dr. Ewald Haufe's "Aus dem Leben eines freien Pedagogen," I venture to ask of you a small space to supply some omissions which, whether due to my inexperience or to my age, I will not attempt to palliate. Taking them in their order: asterisks do not denote omission, but simply the end of a period or change of subject. With my author's hearty concurrence, a few phrases have been softened and slight omissions made; but never to the extent of rendering the author's point of view uncertain.

The date on the title-page of the copy translated is 1894. Dr. Haufe's birthday was March 15, 1854. There exists "in Germany nothing whatever to correspond to our popularly elected School Boards."

Popular education throughout Germany—though never neglected as in England—needed reform in the early years of the last century. The example and model of this reform was set by Prussia. Her wise statesmen saw in true training of her people the only true and safe resurrection from the depths of political overthrow. But Germany has not yet provided for her male education that popular check—that mode of expression for the vox populi—without which education, from above downwards—is apt, as Dr. Haufe complains, to come too much into the power, and be used to serve the interests of State and Church, and moneyed classes.

May it be permitted to hope that defects or omissions in its English dress shall not blind all eyes to the pathetic and heroic touches which mark the "Passages"—viewed as life-sketches of one who, with almost reckless disregard of self, pursued what he held for the highest and most necessary good of mankind.

WILLIAM H. HERFORD.

GOD'S SACRIFICE.

SIR,—I should like, in my turn, to thank Mr. Pike for his letter upon this subject in answer to mine. If, with your permission, I make one or two remarks, it is in no spirit of controversy but only for the purpose of explanation.

I no not say that sacrifice and suffering are equivalent. But I think that a sacrifice necessarily involves suffering. True, there are joyful sacrifices as well as painful ones; and it may be that no "complete sacrifice for love was ever made in which joy was not the prevailing element." But pain is still pain, though love delight to bear it; and unless there were some element of suffering in every sacrifice, there would be nothing for love to triumph over.

With much that Mr. Pike says I quite agree. "I believe that the spiritual universe is the product of God's self-giving love—spiritual beings have thus been produced, endowed with freedom, with the power of rejecting the love to which they owe their being. In this rejection, with the ignorance, selfishness, weakness and disease which it involves, lies the tragedy of human life"; so far I adopt Mr. Pike's words. I should prefer to say "resistance" rather than "rejection," as implying less of conscious intention. This produces the tragedy of human life; yes, but I suggest that this is because love in a human soul is limited in amount and restricted in range. The love of God is not so limited or restricted; therefore we are not, as it seems to me, warranted in carrying up the idea of tragedy from the life of man to the life of God. I do not doubt that it is the constant purpose of God "to redeem men from the effects [of their rejection of His love] and to reveal His own character," and to draw them to Himself, though I would not say "win back their allegiance," because I do not know that allegiance was ever consciously either given or withdrawn. That "God gives His Son" for this purpose may be true; but if the phrase covers no more than the mission of Jesus, then it is only one in an endless series of divine acts of redeeming love, albeit the chief of them.

I entirely agree with Mr. Pike when he says that he "cannot believe that the Father whom Jesus reveals is indifferent to the process of redemption, or even that He is unconcerned with a single pang suffered by any sentient creature. He feels with and for all." I expected that Mr. Pike would make that observation; for I have always found that if one demur to the assertion that God suffers, one is taxed with asserting that He is perfectly indifferent. I can only say that I find great comfort in the thought of the sympathy of God; but I should find none at all if I thought that my trouble was in the same sense and in the same degree His trouble. And I am afraid I do not appreciate, either as poetry or as religion, the lines which Mr. Pike quotes from William Blake. To say of God that, under any circumstances, "He doth sit by us and moan," is to me simply repulsive. Dr. Martineau says (I have my quotation too), "Deity cannot suffer" ("Hours of Thought," II. p. 130.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

SOME of the children who read this column will, perhaps, remember Dr. Sadler, who was for many years minister at Hampstead; and if they do, they will remember him as one of the gentlest and kindest of men. Since his death, a volume of his "Sermons for Children" * has been published. They were spoken to the children of his own congregation at spring and summer evening services held especially for them, and they will be found very good for quiet reading.

There is one sermon "On learning Hymns," another is a "Flower Sermon," and there is also a "Bird Sermon."

The text of the Bird Sermon is in the Song of Solomon ii. 12, "The time of the singing of birds is come," and Dr. Sadler begins by saying that ministers often preach Flower Sermons, and then goes on to show how Birds make a good subject for a sermon too. This is what he says:—

"The flowers are very beautiful, and some of them very sweet; but they cannot sing as the birds do; and it is chiefly on account of their singing that the birds are so delightful to us, though many of them are very beautiful too. They seem like the voice of spring. John Clare said that 'Flowers are Nature's Scripture,' and I think we might say also that birds are Nature's choristers; they are in outward Nature what those boys are in cathedrals and churches who sing the hymns and the anthems. Every sign of happiness in people and living things should call forth our sympathy; and birds seem as if they must be among the happiest of beings. Those of them with which we are most familiar are such sprightly little creatures, now winging their way through the air, now flitting from branch to branch of the trees, almost always in motion, so full of life and activity; but most of all they show their joy by their songs."

Then Dr. Sadler tells of different kinds of birds, and shows how they do not spend all their time in singing, but are very busy getting food and looking after their little ones. And then he tells about a bird of his own:—"I myself had a little sparrow which, when it was only a few days old, I rescued from a cat's mouth. I intended to let it go as soon as it could fly; but we had not taught it how to get its food as its mother would have done, and we felt sure it would be frightened and soon killed if it were turned out; and it seemed very contented and happy with us, so we kept it; and it used to live chiefly in my study, where it would often sit on my table, or at my feet, when I was writing my sermons; and if I went to fetch a book from the other side of the room it would hop after me. It seemed always to prefer companionship, and would call after me if I were out of the room. Once, when we had been away from home for three months, it welcomed us back with a sweet and delicate little song, which was sung only when it was very happy. It was a playful, intelligent, interesting, affectionate little friend, and it and I got on very well together. We seemed quite to understand one another, and I think it regarded me as the best friend it had in the world. When it died of old age I missed it a great deal, for I was very fond of it; but I had the satisfaction of thinking that its life had been a long and happy one. Some birds, such as the raven, the parrot, and the eagle, live longer than we do; but the sparrow is supposed to live only about six years. My sparrow, however, lived between nine and ten years; and this, I thought, was a sign that it had been well cared for."

When you have read this, you will probably want to know more of Dr. Sadler's sermons and I hope a good many of you may be able to get the book, if you haven't got it already. This is the end of the "Bird Sermon":—

"My dear children, I dare say you have sometimes thought, as I have, how pleasant it would be to be able to fly; but in truth we have much better wings than the birds have; we have the wings of thought, and holy desires and prayer, by which we can fly higher than any bird can fly. 'Brightness, and mirth, and love, and faith, all fly.' It is on this account that the angels are represented as having wings. And we hope for better wings in the end than we have yet.

> Wings beyond our mortal strife,
> Wings in unconfined life.

Now I will close my Bird Sermon with a saying by Thomas à Kempis, which I hope you will all remember, for nothing better or more worth remembering could be said: 'By two wings a man is lifted up from things earthly: one is simplicity, the other purity.' We are led to goodness and God when we have a simple and pure desire for what is good."

THE TEACHER OF RELIGION.

THE earnest letter, which will be found in another column, from Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE, contains a challenge to Unitarians which must command their respectful attention. From the vantage ground of her eighty years, well nigh complete, and with the gathered experience of a long life instinct with moral ardour and devoted to unselfish labours, Miss COBBE looks out upon the world, seeing the pressing needs of our day, and asks us to consider whether we have not been too much occupied with thoughts concerning the person of JESUS, and too little with the supreme religious truths which he lived and died to teach, and whether, in particular, we ought not now to be giving our whole strength, in face of the breaking down of old supports, to the establishment of a faith, which shall be at one with practical faithfulness, and in which the spiritual and moral needs of men shall find complete and abiding satisfaction.

Before making further reference to some special points in Miss COBBE's letter, we are glad to take this opportunity of offering a cordial welcome to the new edition of her well-known essay on Intuitive Morals,* a book originally published in 1855, and now issued in a fourth edition, with a new preface and appendices, which include a reprint of the essay on "Darwinianism in Morals," contributed by Miss COBBE to the Theological Review in 1871, and some further notes, dated in March of the present year, on the "Spencer-Darwin theory of morals." While the expositions of this book, as Miss COBBE admits, might need revision, if it were to be re-written now, we believe that its main contention is unshaken and unshakable, that our sense of moral obligation, and the hunger after righteousness awakened in us by the moral ideal, cannot be explained away or truly resolved into any lower elements, but bear witness to a Divine presence in our human life, and afford the surest ground for our trust in the Living GOD, and our assured hope of immortality. The book has an added interest, as having been the first serious effort, in the early years of a remarkable career, after the great crisis of Miss COBBE's own inward life, to impart to others the moral inspiration and the new faith to which she had attained. And now, in the evening of a long life, still active in the cause of truth and right, she bears this testimony in the new preface to her book :—

I would hope it may add something to whatsoever weight the arguments in this book may of themselves carry, to say that they have served one human soul, even a very weak and faulty one, as a real working theory of Faith and Duty for half a century. Not as a recluse shut out from new ideas have I passed these fifty years, but as a woman living in intimate converse with many of the best minds of the last great century; minds the equals of which I should be at a loss to find now. I have travelled; I have worked for years among the poor and seen much of their miseries. I have been engaged for half the interval since I wrote this book in endeavouring to stop the scientific torture of animals, and their wrongs and sufferings have proved the hardest trial of my faith. I have kept up to a certain extent those studies in philosophy and theology which (as this book may witness), I pursued with perhaps unusual ardour in youth. I have known great and long happiness; and also great sorrow. And now, on the verge of the final experience of mortality, I can humbly testify that my early faith in God's absolute Goodness and in a blessed Life hereafter has not failed me or broken down. I can, therefore, offer this book to a younger generation of readers with the honest belief that, with all its faults and shortcomings, it is capable of affording a satisfying solution of some of the deeper questionings of the intellect, and views of the holy law of Conscience and of the great Purpose of human existence which can scarcely fail to uplift and comfort the soul by which they may be received.

And, again, at the conclusion of the last appendix, she writes :—

With all humility I can but give the reader as the results of the thoughts of a lifetime, this conclusion : –

I believe that "God is with mortals by Conscience"; that Conscience is truly the meeting-ground of the Divine Spirit with the finite spirits of which He is the Father; and I believe God to be absolutely Just, absolutely Good, whatsoever hindrances to that perfect faith this world of sin and sorrow may present. I do so for this reason above all others: that His voice in our consciences lays upon us the law of Justice and Goodness.

If now we turn to the questions raised by the letter which Miss COBBE has addressed to us, we find ourselves in complete accord with the contention that faith must be established not on any ancient record even of the greatest human teacher, but on the present witness to that which is Divine in our actual life; and we fully realise the difference which separates us, as Unitarians, from those to whom CHRIST is GOD Himself. But while we may readily admit that "our love and reverence for the historical JESUS may be much better shown by living out the Sermon on the Mount, than by debating for ever whose son he was," we do not on that account hold that JESUS is to be entirely relegated to "the history of Religion" in the past, or that in our "Religion itself" he, as the supreme religious teacher among men, has no natural, and indeed vitally helpful, place.

Our faith, it is true, must be grounded in direct and present experience of the spiritual life, the hidden life with GOD, and it must be nurtured in loyalty to the moral ideal, for which Miss COBBE has so nobly contended. But that life comes to its fulness, and realises all the height and depth of its meaning, only in human fellowship, and amid the conditions of duty in our great human brotherhood; and this must ever include the revealers of what is highest in our common humanity, in its life with GOD, and therefore, as we hold, above all others, JESUS, the "great chief of faithful souls." Our knowledge of the love of GOD, of the strength of eternal righteousness, and of the meaning of surrender to the Father's will, is perfected, as otherwise it cannot be, when we are with him, as a living Friend, in the Divine presence, though so long since hidden from mortal sight, and when in the spirit of a true discipleship we strive, as he did in his own day, to do the duties of our time and in brotherly love to serve our fellow-men.

This, at any rate, may indicate a possible and quite natural frame of mind for a perfectly reasonable religious faith, and one which we believe more fully meets our human needs than that which would separate the past history of our race from its present religious experiences and affections.

At the same time, this does not cut us off from complete sympathy with Miss COBBE's plea for fearless testimony to the Divine facts of our present life, or from her ardent aspiration after a more perfect faithfulness to present duty.

* "The Theory of Intuitive Morals," being a corrected reprint of the Third Edition of an Essay on "Intuitive Morals," with a new Preface and Appendices by Frances Power Cobbe. Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d.

THINK what a divine creature man is! He alone admires. He alone embraces the whole, and is conscious of the divine idea. Other creatures are beautiful and happy, but they know not how beautiful they are. They love, but they know not how lovely love is. The tree amidst all its beauty lies hidden from itself; the bird is shrouded in its own music, as the tree amidst its own leaves. It knows nothing of the wood but the shelter it gets from it; nothing of the ringing harmonies around but its own joy which it pipes incessantly through all. It is only when some poet comes looking, loitering, listening, that all this beauty of the leafy wood, and all this happiness, is revealed and felt. God re-creates His world in the consciousness of man. In us it is that He finally accomplishes His divine idea.—William Smith in "Thorndale."

DR. HALE'S BIRTHDAY CELEBRATION.

THE eightieth anniversary of Dr. Edward Everett Hale's birth was celebrated in Boston on Thursday, April 3. We delayed any full record of the celebration, hoping that some vivid description of the occasion would reach us from across the Atlantic, with those personal touches which mean so much at such a time; but the Christian Register made its issue of April 3 the birthday number, giving the programme of the great meeting in Symphony Hall, on the evening of that day, printing in full the address of greeting and congratulation by Senator Hoar, and giving also a forecaste of Dr. Hale's reply. With this, therefore, we must be content; and, indeed, we are thankful to have so much, for Senator Hoar's address, being that of an old parishioner and an intimate friend, went straight to the heart of the subject and was clearly adequate to the occasion.

The celebration opened with Psalm 150, sung to special music by the Cecilia Society, and the following sentences were then read responsively, the whole assembly standing:—

Let us now praise famous men, men renowned for their power, giving counsel by their understanding and declaring prophecies.

Leaders of the people by their counsel and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people, wise and eloquent in their instructions.

Their seed shall continually remain a good inheritance, and their children are within the covenant. The people will tell of their wisdom, and the congregation will show forth their praise.

He that giveth his mind to the law of the Most High, and is occupied in the meditation thereof, will seek out the wisdom of the ancients and be occupied in prophecies.

He will keep the sayings of renowned men, and where subtile parables are he will be there also. He will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables.

He shall show forth that which he hath learned, and shall glory in the law of the covenant of the Lord.

Lord, who shall abide in thy tabernacle, who shall dwell in thy holy hill? He that walketh uprightly and worketh righteousness and speaketh the truth in his heart.

He shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season. His leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper.

Happy is the man that findeth wisdom and the man that getteth understanding, for the merchandise of it is better than the merchandise of silver and the gain thereof than fine gold.

Length of days is in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honour. Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.

The fear of the Lord maketh a merry heart, and giveth joy and gladness and a long life.

The root of wisdom is to fear the Lord, and the branches thereof are long life.

Sweet language will multiply friends; and a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings.

A faithful friend is a strong defence; and they that fear the Lord shall find him.

Be willing to hear every godly discourse, and let not the parables of understanding escape thee.

And if thou seest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him, and let thy foot wear the steps of his door.

For honourable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by number of years.

But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age.

The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh judgment. The law of the Lord is in his heart. None of his steps shall slide.

They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever.

Other music followed, and then the address by the Hon. George F. Hoar, who spoke of Dr. Hale as having carried the genius for private and personal friendship into his dealings with all mankind, and as having been ever a prophet of good hope and a preacher of good cheer. "Dr. Hale has not been a founder of a sect. He has never been a builder of partition walls. He has helped throw down a good many." At the beginning of his ministry at Worcester, in 1846, he set the example of abandoning the old distinction of the church and congregation, opening in his church the Communion of the Lord's Supper to all who sincerely desired to take part in it. The following passages of the address we print in full.

"We are not thinking chiefly of another world when we think of Dr. Hale or when we listen to him. He has been telling us all his life that what the theologians call two worlds are but one; that the kingdom of God is here, within and around you; that there is but one universe, and not two; that the relation of man to God is that of father and child, not of master and slave, or even sovereign and subject; that, when man wields any of the great forces of the universe, it is God also who is wielding them through him; that the power of a good man is one of God's powers; and that, when man is doing his work faithfully, the supreme power of God's omnipotence is with him.

"Dr. Hale has done a good many things in his own matchless fashion. He would have left a remarkable name and fame behind him if he had been nothing but a student and narrator of history, as he has studied and told it; if he had been nothing but a writer of fiction, the author of 'The Man without a Country' or 'Ten Times One is Ten,' or 'In His Name.' If he had done nothing but organise the Lend a Hand Clubs, now found in the four quarters of the world; if he had been nothing but an eloquent Christian preacher; if he had been nothing but a beloved pastor; if he had been only a voice which lifted to heaven in prayer the souls of great congregations; if he had been only a public-spirited citizen, active and powerful in every good word and work for the benefit of this people: if he had been only the man who devised the plan that might have saved Texas from slavery, and thereby prevented the Civil War, and which did thereafter save Kansas; if he had been only remembered as the spiritual friend and comforter of large numbers of men and women who were desolate and stricken by poverty and sorrow; if he had been only a zealous lover of his country, comprehending, as scarcely any other man has comprehended, the true spirit of the American people—if he had been any one of these things, as he has been, it would be enough to satisfy the most generous aspiration of any man, enough to make his life worth living for himself and his race. And yet, and yet, do I exaggerate one particle, when I say that Dr. Hale has been all these, and more?

"Edward Everett Hale has been the interpreter of a pure, simple, loving, and living faith to thousands and thousands of souls. He has taught us that the fatherhood and tenderness of God are manifested here and now in this world, as they will be hereafter; that the religion of Christ is a religion of daily living; that salvation is the purifying of the soul from sin, not its escape from the consequences of sin. He is the representative and incarnation of the best and loftiest Americanism. He knows the history of his country, and knows his countrymen through and through. He does not fancy that he loves his country, while he dislikes and despises his countrymen and everything they have done and are doing. The history he loves and has helped to write and to make is not the history of a base and mean people who have drifted by accident into empire. It is the history of such a nation as Milton conceived, led and guided by men whom Milton would have loved. He will have a high and permanent place in literature, which none but Defoe shares. He possesses the two rarest of gifts, that to give history the fascination of fiction, and that to give fiction the verisimilitude of history. He has been the minister of comfort in sorrow and of joy in common life to countless persons to whom his friendship is among their most precious blessings, or by whose fireside he sits, personally unknown, yet a perpetual and welcome guest."

The following is the conclusion of the address:—

"And now what can we give you who have given us so much? We have something to give on our side. We bring you a more costly and precious gift than any jewel or diadem, though it came from an emperor's treasury.

Love is a present for a mighty king.

"We bring you the heart's love of Boston where you were born, and Worcester, where you took the early vows you have kept so well; of Massachusetts, who knows she has no worthier son; and of the great and free country to whom you have taught new lessons of patriotism, and whom you have served in a thousand ways.

"This prophet is honoured in his own country. There will be a place found for him somewhere in the house of many mansions. I do not know what will be the employment of our dear friend in the world whose messages he has been bringing to us so long. But I like to think he will be sent on some errands like that of the presence which came to Ben Adhem with a great wakening light, rich and like a lily in bloom, to tell him that the name of him who loved his fellow-men led all the names of those whom the love of God had blessed."

We wish that it had been possible to obtain a complete record of Dr. Hale's reply, but perhaps the Register did wisely not to attempt it, since in the actual reply there must have been so much which printed words could not convey.

The birthday number contained also some interesting notes on Dr. Hale's career by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick, and a series of portraits; but a subsequent issue announced that this number is no longer to be had.

THE FUTURE.

BY EDWARD EVERETT HALE, D.D.*

Monarchies have risen and fallen, oligarchies have risen and fallen, and republics have risen and fallen; and every day a man who sees many people is asked why he may not expect the fall of the American nation to come as rapidly as its greatness came. "Do you remember Zenobia? Do you remember Carthage? Do you remember Venice? Do you remember that

> The name of "Commonwealth" is past and gone
> Over three fractions of the groaning globe?

Yes; any sensible man, though he knows very little history, knows that it had passed and gone when Byron wrote those lines, all but despairing, some fourscore years ago. Since that time, however, the name and the thing have "looked up" in the great Price Current of the world's esteem.

. . . . .

Why should not the American Republic go the way of Carthage or the Empire of Zenobia? This is the question which some people ask, generally the people who read some very cynical weekly newspaper.

Answer. First, the American Republic, having committed itself absolutely to universal suffrage—which means the rule of the average man—has committed itself absolutely and through and through to the education of all men and all women, so as to keep the average high enough for its government and in general for its future.

The American nation was founded by he consent and co-operation of such men as Ben Franklin, George Washington, Sam Adams, Robert Morris, and others like them. These men were all from the ranks. Washington was no exception. They were not trained to govern. Except Washington they were not trained to war. They were trained to tell the truth, to live for others, to keep their eyes open; and they believed in God and in the people. To the conscience, the sagacity, the faith and hope of such men, and of hundreds like them, we owe the establishment of this nation.

These men were educated, with advantages inconceivably poor, as the present generation judges of education, in the years between 1720 and 1760. Franklin's training began a little before the first of these dates. All of them were in the harness, and all of them were pulling together by the time of the Stamp Act. The education proved to be sufficient. And under the lead of such men this nation came into being.

Now in this very month in which I am writing, in which the Register is registering, and the reader reading, there are in this nation three million boys, more or less, and as many girls, who are receiving as good a school training, on the average, as those men received who made the Republic. In some cases the training is worse, but in the great majority of cases it is better. This is not in centres of life merely; it is on the frontier as well.

I had the good fortune not long since to be in three frontier towns on the northern line of Maine. In the three towns there were four high schools equal to any school in Boston or Chicago or New York in their equipment. Their masters were admirably well trained to their business. In every one of them a boy could be fitted for Harvard or a girl for Smith College. And every boy or girl in the neighbourhood could attend at the public charge.

The boys and girls who attended were of the same blood, the same religion, only better, the same habits, the same hopes, as the statesmen whom I have named. They all believed in the Star of their nation. They believed it was the best nation in the world.

From such boys and girls the leaders of the next half-century will be evolved. To me it seems absurd to say or to fear that they will not be able to maintain what their ancestors created.

Then people say to you, "Yes, but Carthage. Yes, but Venice."

Answer No. 2. Carthage and Venice were governed by oligarchies or aristocracies. The United States is a Republic, and it is governed by its people. What is more, it is cared for by its God. Neither Carthage nor Venice had any such store of physical wealth to draw upon as America has. Nor had either of them such infinite blessing of daily sunshine and rain or of the dews of evening, or generally of the gifts which are certain every day.

This nation will need more iron. Yes, and the God who cares for the nation leaves iron lying around loose on the soil. This land will have the world to feed. All ready for the business, the good God has stored the "Desert of America," the valleys of California, with the phosphates and nitrates, the proteins and deuteins and treiseins and all the other niceties which the chemists find man's daily bread. The land will need ice in summer. Yes; and here is ice for the cutting. It will need fuel in winter. Yes; and here is coal for the shovelling. What difference whether the ice were made yesterday, or the coal stored a million years ago? God Is.

Answer 3. And the real victory comes, and the certainty that it is a victory which will not drivel out in defeat, because man, who is educating his children as well as he knows how, is of the nature of this infinite and good God, can work with Him, likes to work with Him, just as the good God works with His children and is glad to work with them. The greatest of the victories of the nineteenth century is in this, that men have come back into their Father's arms. They work with Him, and know they do. He works with them, and they know that also. A hundred years ago they did not know this. It was written in their sacred books, but they did not understand it. Even their priests and preachers told them that they were children of wrath and of the devil, and incapable of good. These false prophets told them that God was a judge, who was trying them and punishing them. Now they have detected the lie. They know that they are of one blood, and born from Him. When they choose, He lends them from His omnipotence; and they work with that. When they choose, they work with Him. His work is a part of theirs. Theirs is a part of His.

Carthage never had such encouragement, nor Venice, nor poor Zenobia, nor poor Rome, nor Athens, nor Babylon, nor Nineveh, nor had any of these such uncounted treasures of wealth to work upon. Nor had any of them such men and women, trained thus to the common service.

All for each, and each for all.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM AND A LIVING WAGE.

The two following letters by the Rev. Priestley Prime appeared in the Manchester City News of April 5 and 12.

I.

Sir,—The housing problem is not merely a housing problem; it is a living problem. This is becoming more manifest as the result of such scientifically accurate investigations as have been undertaken and successfully carried out by Mr. Charles Booth in London, and Mr. Seebohm Rowntree in York. It is no longer possible for intelligent people who have learned what are the results of these investigations to explain poverty and slum life as the result of drunkenness and laziness. These are a large element in the problem which must be met on many sides, and on this side assuredly as well as on others. But the remarkable facts that are being demonstrated with a precision never before attained, show that millions of the working people of England cannot earn enough money to buy food and clothing and pay the rent of houses such as are absolutely necessary for healthy existence, though they may never miss work on a single working day and may spend not a penny on amusement, holiday, decoration, education, charity, religion, or provision for the future.

Mr. Rowntree calculates on the basis of acknowledged dietetic authorities that 21s. 8d. a week is the smallest sum on which a moderate-sized family can be maintained in fair working condition. The food suggested would not be attractive to any but a hungry man; it is chosen not for its agreeable taste, but for its cheapness—the largest possible amount of nourishment for the money. As a matter of fact, no one ever does buy food with this entire disregard of all considerations except cheapness and nourishment, and few have the knowledge of the expert, which would enable them to do so. Yet, mark the conditions. If this knowledge were general and all other considerations were subordinated to the one purpose of getting as much work-power as possible out of each shillings-worth of food, 21s. 8d. is the minimum on which healthy physical existence can be maintained. This makes not any allowance for beer, tobacco, or other indulgences; clothing has nothing spent on it for appearance; all is for use. Books, newspapers, toys for the children, ribbons or flowers, trams and trains, all social or intellectual pursuits, all but bare animal existence and maintenance of power to continue working, are left out of count.

This minimum wage on which working people can be maintained as healthy labouring animals in efficient condition for their work is not reached by millions of the people of our country. At a recent conference in Manchester, attended mainly by trade-union delegates, it was stated by one of them that the average wage of an unskilled labourer in Manchester is 16s. 8d. a week, and that there was an effort being made to establish twenty shillings a week as a minimum wage. We may be sure that the expenses of living in Manchester are not less than in York, and therefore it is perfectly clear that in Manchester, as in London and York, a large proportion of the people are seriously underfed, insufficiently clothed, and unhealthily housed, and this, quite apart from the aggravation of their condition, through the drunkenness, laziness, and ignorance of some of them.

This is a most serious condition of affairs. Eliminate from the present consideration of the question all motives of humanity; consider it as a practical matter in commercial and national affairs. It does not pay to underfeed those whom we expect to do the nation's work. The expression "living wage," which has come into use in connection with labour questions in recent years, gains new significance in the light of these recent investigations. Should we not, perhaps, refer to a "working wage," a wage on which the power to work fully and efficiently may be maintained? The tramway company which systematically underfed its horses would not be practising a true economy, and it is a wasteful method to stint the supply of fuel, even to an engine, below the amount at which it can get up steam and keep the wheels in motion. The labourer who is short of bread may be expected to be short of energy, and no amount of political economy of the old or of any school will make his muscles do more work than the amount of energy with which he has been fed, at least for any length of time, though he may be worked out and left a wreck. Nor can he be kept at a good working level if he cannot afford to live in a house in which health, decency, and cleanliness are possible. A gentleman who is deeply interested in the housing question in Liverpool, and who is well known in that city, remarked recently, in the course of conversation about the efforts made there to solve the problem, "We cannot possibly put up houses in which a healthy, decent life is possible at a rental which the labourer can afford to pay."

Here, then, is the problem. Probably one-third of the workers of this country cannot with their wages get a home or food or clothing of such quantity and kind as will maintain their efficiency as workers, though they should consent to live only for their work—a merely animal existence—expending nothing on the higher needs of a moral and intellectual being. If they are drunken, so much the worse; if lazy, so much the worse; if vicious, so much the worse; but apart from these moral complications the economic problem cannot be solved by any means which does not include an actual increase in wages, an increased power in the possession of the worker of getting for himself and his family the necessary food and clothing and housing. A nation of unhealthy underfed workers cannot long hold a high position if other nations have learned a better method. We are told that the Americans are our chief competitors in the markets of the world. Nearly twenty years ago a considerable number of the manufacturers of New England recognised the truth that "Old England" fails to understand even now—that from an underfed, ill-housed discontented body of workp ple we cannot get so much good w_k as from those to whom we give the opportunity of healthy, well-nourished, self-respecting life.

The treasurer (or manager) of several large companies said to me in 1886, "I have been able to prove to my directors and shareholders that it pays to give good wages for a moderate day's work, and to spend money in providing good conditions for them in the factory and at their homes."

II.

SIR,—The facts and thoughts which you allowed me to bring before the readers in the City News last week point clearly to the conclusion that there is no possible solution of the housing problem, or of the living problem of which it is a part, which does not include wages of a higher purchasing power for the millions who, at present rates, cannot even earn enough to maintain physical efficiency, however sober, frugal, and prudent they may be. Higher wages or a higher purchasing power for the same wages must be secured, or the man as a working animal reproducing his species to such an extent merely as would maintain the supply of labourers, has not enough fuel to keep the human machinery fully at work, or enough shelter to protect it from such damage as would greatly reduce the value of the machine for commercial purposes. It is clear, therefore, on the grounds of enlightened self-interest, that it pays to feed and house a man with proper and sufficient food and shelter if you want to get plenty of work out of him, and still more is it necessary if the quality as well as the quantity is considered.

The only possible circumstances in which it can be in any way remunerative to pay less than a living wage are those in which an employer intends to use the labourer only for a short season, squeezing out of him all he can, and casting him off when the process is no longer possible or convenient. Such are to my mind the real cases of "sweating"—getting more out of a man than you put into him, pumping him dry, sucking his blood. Undoubtedly a few fortunes may be made in this way, but at what a terrible cost! In the narrowest and meanest sense this can be profitable to the individual who engages in such commerce only so long as the great majority of his fellow-men act upon other and higher principles; and from the public or national point of view his gains are but a small percentage on the irretrievable loss due to the process. He destroys a hundred times as much as he gains. His wealth is about as profitable to the community as that of a man who burns down a house that he may make away with a few articles out of the débris.

All humane, philanthropic, or moral motives which are brought into the consideration of this question add immediately to the force of the argument that something like a living wage must be secured for the sober, industrious worker. But I have argued the matter as one of commercial and even selfish expediency for the individual manufacturer, the firm, the company, or the combine that employs labour. To the general or national prosperity the continuance of the present condition of things will be disastrous. If some people succeed in making profit by the deterioration of the race, and others go blindly on, penny-wise and pound-foolish, managing to scrape together for themselves a small or large profit while contributing to the evil, the falling-off in the efficiency of the workers as a body, forming as they do the foundation on which manufacture, commerce, and national prosperity are built, will drag down the whole community. If other nations are wise and build up better physical constitutions in their people, nurture them better, educate them better, and give them a fuller, happier life, we shall not be able to keep ahead of them by conquering new territory and shedding blood. New territory, or old, belongs to those who can use its opportunities, and the only sure foundation of national greatness is the ability, strength, character, and high purpose of its people.

Many years ago, soon after I began to inquire into the actual working of factories, the manager of a large company that had recently reduced its normal working hours made a remark which opened my eyes to many things I had not seen before. He said, "We find it pays us better to work ten hours a day than twelve." "I suppose wages are reckoned by the hour, then?" "No, the wages by the week are the same as before. But the workers get more done in the time, and do it better. We get about as much done and keep our machinery running two hours less each day, and lighting and heating and other charges are lower." The conditions under which a man lives, his home life, his intellectual horizon, his character, his contentment, and hopefulness are all elements in determining the value of his services; he cannot as a regular thing work long hours with the same intensity as short ones; he cannot continue heavy work without sufficient nourishment; and all exercise of mind and body must be maintained by a sufficiency of appropriate food.

PRISONERS.

EVERYWHERE the sculptor hears
A voice unheard by other ears;
It half commands and half entreats,
As this burden it repeats:
"Hasten, master! quickly come!
Countless ages, dark and dumb,
Frozen in this prison white
Has my beauty longed for light.
Hasten! with thy chisel keen
Cut away my marble screen,
And before your gladdened eyes
See a perfect statue rise."

So at times I strangely hear Messages distinctly near.
"Tarry not! I would be free!"
Whisper lips well known to me.
"Silence deeper than the tomb,
Darkness raven as the gloom
Wrapping the decrees of Fate,
Here surround me as I wait.
Hasten, hasten to set free
Thy perfect self that is to be."

WILLIAM ROSCOE THAYER.

PREDESTINATION.

Among the preliminary tasks required in any adequate attempt at theological reconstruction, that of tracing the great historic doctrines to their roots in experience must be regarded as first in importance. Certainly there is none that provides greater interest and promises more attractive discoveries. It is a field which will be found rich in surprises to the careful explorer. Attention may, perhaps, usefully be drawn to one example lying rather outside the range of more immediate controversies.

A wide consensus of opinion to-day is ready to declare that nothing has fallen into deeper discredit than the doctrine of Predestination. Nothing, it is urged, can ever put life again into that grotesque theory. It is remembered only as a glaring illustration of the folly of which the human mind has been capable in its endeavour to justify the ways of God to men. The notion of an elect body, foreordained to salvation by divine decree, is freely characterised as among the most perverse of human inventions. Two defects are thought to disentitle it to further consideration. One is its alleged representation of the Deity as arbitrary and capricious, whose mode of dealing with men is determined by favouritism and partiality. It maligns the character of God. The other is the arrogance it argues in all who claim to be of the predestined. None can regard themselves as the special recipients of this divine favour without unpardonable presumption. The doctrine, therefore, is a witness to the ugly lengths to which spiritual pride can proceed, and the exclusiveness so often inseparable from the most convinced believers in the reality of Divine Grace. Trace it to its roots, it is said, and you come upon the unlovely spirit of arrogance, of wilful self-assertion.

That the doctrine of Predestination has often been stated in terms that go far to justify this criticism, that it has often been held in this sense and ministered too frequently to many of the least admirable instincts in human nature, is undeniable. It is not, however, with its several developments that we are at present concerned. We have to do with its origins, the roots in experience to which it may be traced. It may be that, if inquiry allows us to reach them, we shall be led to take a more favourable view of its historical manifestations, and discover that the method of summary repudiation is only possible by diverting attention from certain constituent elements of the highest significance. No little astonishment is in store for any who begin their investigation with the idea that they will find presumption and swollen self-esteem at the sources. Pursuing their way along the only channels proper for such examination, the experience of the greatest Predestinarians, they will discover qualities of heart that are the precise opposite of these. They will find the most profound humility, the most complete disavowal of personal claims. It is safe to say that the theory of the elect could have suggested itself to none in whom the sense of absolute unworthiness was not predominant. We must bear in mind, when we conceive of the elect as enjoying privileges and visited by favours, that our thought, if it takes in nothing else, is not moving in the right plane for a true appreciation. That is only the external estimate of the position. We must enter the inner life of him who believes himself predestined and analyse the processes which force this conviction upon him.

We find him constrained by two leading convictions. He is convinced of sin, he is equally convinced of salvation. He knows that there dwells in him no good thing and yet he also knows that good is performed in him. He knows that he is without power against the sin that besets him and that nevertheless his sin is overcome. His heart is aware of a love that goes out to God, at the same time he disclaims with an even passionate insistence all personal responsibilty for its presence. Conscious of his own weakness, attested in so many inglorious battles with evil inclination, he beholds nothing in himself that will account for the strength that has come upon him. It is not his own, not a tittle of it owes its appearance to his own initiative, it is God's and the free gift of His Grace. This is as he reads his own experience, and, to begin with, it is his experience alone that is in question. To that and that only he strives to give expression.

But it follows that he cannot rest there. Reflection is bound to carry him further and bid him compare his experience with others. Immediately he discovers that there are others who have known nothing similar to it. On their own testimony he finds that they have passed through no such process. They cannot testify to any such entrance into their life of grace from above, they record nothing that speaks of a Divine Love that has sought them out and overborne their will and claimed them for its possession. Some are indifferent to the presence of sin and do not recognise it as a disturbing element in their consciousness. Others are happy in the persuasion that native self-reliance is sufficient for all things. Neither know anything that has happened to them which requires the explanation of a Divine constraint, of a God who has at all times been beforehand with them, the impulse and the efficacy of every step towards Him. If he has interpreted his own experience correctly, how shall he interpret theirs? If no other interpretation is adequate to the facts as he knows them in his life, what is to be sufficient for the facts of their lives as he knows them on their own report? God has called him, He has not called them. He has chosen him as an object of His informing grace, them He has not so chosen. We may demur to the right of logic to determine anything in matters of this intimate and spiritual nature; but if once we admit it a voice, it is difficult to see what other judgment it can pronounce.

Dr. Bigg, in his valuable introduction to his edition of the "Confessions of Saint Augustine," points out that it is in the "Confessions" we learn what Augustine really meant by predestination. He meant "not the fiat of an arbitrary will, but the attraction of one personality for another." And he asks, "Why do we love anybody? Those who can explain this can solve the problem of free will." Augustine, as he reviewed his life, could find one explanation that alone was fitted to the facts. He was aware throughout its course of a Love that had been drawing him in his own despite, arousing by degrees an answering love within his heart, submerging all its wilfulness, and overbearing all its reluctances. Why, why had he been thus visited? Why were there others in whom no such Divine invasion had taken place? The question was indeed unanswerable; yet Augustine proceeded to a solution, and found it in his doctrine of Predestination. It is a solution which is vulnerable at many points, as must ever be the case with all attempts of the understanding to locate in its own region what can only appear there in the form of an irreducible dilemma. Le cœur a ses raisons, que la raison ne connaît point. Nevertheless, it is well to remember that though the question admits of no answer it will never cease to be asked. While there are hearts that behold in the Redemptive love of God the amazement that dims all marvels, it will repeatedly be raised. Hence all criticism of this particular solution, if it is to be relevant and have value, must start from the recognition that there is a question inviting an answer, however incapable human intelligence may be of providing it. Too many current repudiations of the predestinarian theory are vitiated by its absence.

The foregoing considerations, therefore, make it apparent that when we seek the roots of the doctrine in mere presumption and trace the thought of election to the claims of self-assertion we are travelling very wide of the mark. We only know what it means when we have learned of what self-abasement and prostrate humbleness the human soul is capable.

It may be added, in conclusion, that the surprises which reward the investigation of origins are continued in the study of various features in the history of the doctrine. For example Dr. Robertson in his recently published Bampton lectures, Regnum Dei, discusses Augustine's predestination theory in its relation to his view of the Catholic Church. He shows that Augustine never really regarded the Kingdom of God as co-extensive with the visible church, and that it was his conception of the elect which prevented this identification. His doctrine of Predestination exercised a spiritualising influence on his conception of the Church. It forbade him to rest in the idea that the limits of the Kingdom of God could ever be determined by external standards, and could not be wider nor less embracing than the consciousness of Divine dominion in the soul. Among the influences which help to bind us to-day to the conviction that the Kingdom of God is within, and teach us that the sole test of its presence must be sought in inward faith and its visible fruits, not the least potent are those which have been made possible for us by the greatest of the Predestinarians.

"THE STORY OF THE TARGUMS."

Sir,—Will you kindly allow me to say that I shall be glad to send, free of cost, a copy of my appendix to the above, on "The Transition from Hebrew to Aramaic," to any of your readers who may be sufficiently interested to apply for it?

I have already sent copies to as many persons as I knew had received copies of my address. If I have omitted any, I will immediately send a copy on receipt of a postcard giving name and address.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Ashton-under-Lyne.—A Sale of Work was held on last Saturday. The opening ceremony was performed by Mrs. James Pollitt, under the chairmanship of Councillor John Wilson, J.P., a prominent local Methodist, who often attends the services. The sum of £51 was raised. The Ladies' Sewing Society, after making other contributions towards the expenses of improving both building and site, have by this effort brought their winter work to a very satisfactory close.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday by the Rev. J. J. Wright, who gave two inspiring discourses. The attendances were larger than on any previous occasion. In the evening every seat in the chapel and school was occupied. The anthems, &c., were accompanied by a full orchestra. The collections amounted to £26 15s, being a large increase over last year, and the highest for twenty years.

Boston.—The anniversary service in connection with the re-opening of Spain-lane Chapel took place on Sunday evening last. The Rev. A. Hall, M.A., of Norwich, very kindly came over to conduct the service, and there was a large attendance, about 110 being present (including a good many strangers). Mr. Hall took for his subject, "Why am I a Unitarian?" A bazaar is to be held early in June.

Bristol.—The annual meeting of subscribers and friends of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission was held on the Mission premises on April 28, Mr. P. J. Worsley, J.P., in the chair. The Chairman having in his opening address paid a tribute to the late President of the Mission, the late Mr. Arthur H. Wansey, the reports of the Committee, of the Missionary (Mr. J. B. Robinson), and of the hon. treasurer (Mr. J. K. Champion), were read and adopted. A vote of thanks and appreciation to Mr. and Mrs. Robinson was moved by Mr. Worsley, seconded by Mr. Champion, and carried unanimously. The main item in the business which followed was the election, by a very cordial vote, of Mr. Worsley to the office of President of the Mission. The committee and auditors for the following year having been elected, an expression of thanks to Mr. Worsley for his services as chairman brought the meeting to a close.

Carmarthen.—The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter visited the Presbyterian College on Monday last, and under the title "The Sacred Books of the East," delivered to the students of the College a lecture on "The Progress and Results of the Study of Comparative Religion."

Clydach Vale: South Wales.—On Thursday, April 24, the annual congregational tea-party was held, about 200 of all ages partaking. The evening passed off most pleasantly, and is expected to realise a substantial amount towards the church funds.

Dewsbury.—A successful bazaar was held on Saturday, Monday, and Tuesday, April 26, 28, and 29, resulting in an addition of about £135 to the church funds. The opening ceremony was performed on the first day by Miss Caroline A. Lawrence, of London, the Rev. C. Hargrove, M.A., of Mill Hill, in the chair. Short addresses were also given by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot and Mr. F. Clayton, in moving and seconding a vote of thanks to Miss Lawrence. The second day's proceedings were opened by Miss Hudson, of Bradford; and on Tuesday the openers were eight little girls belonging to the Sunday-school, who were dressed to represent flowers, and each of whom recited an appropriate verse. A pleasing feature about Tuesday's re-opening was that the children had collected exactly a guinea amongst them, which was handed over as their donation to the bazaar fund. A gloom was cast over the second and third days' proceedings by the tragically sudden death of Mrs. Matthew Idle, an old and highly respected member of the congregation, who was present until the close of the proceedings on Saturday evening, but whose husband found her dead when he returned from the service on Sunday morning. She was related to several of the active workers in the bazaar. Great credit is due to Miss Howe and Mr. Sanderson, who acted as joint-secretaries of the Bazaar Committee, for their unwearied efforts; and indeed to all who helped in any way to realise so satisfactory a result. Sincere thanks are also due to the generous friends who so readily helped with donations of money and goods. (See list in advertisement columns.)

London: Brixton.—On Thursday evening, April 24, a concert, kindly arranged by Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Hudson, was given in the schoolroom of Effra-road Church, on behalf of the London Domestic Mission. Mr. and Mrs. Hudson secured the help of talented friends, among whom were Miss Bessie Cole, Miss Major, Mr. John Harrison, Mr. F. J. Nettlefold, Mr. Edwards, and Mr. Albrecht, and gave an admirable performance, which was warmly applauded. The sum raised for the Mission, including one or two donations, was £13 10s. Hearty thanks are due to all concerned for their generous help.

London: Islington (Presentation).—On Wednesday, April 23, a social gathering was held in the schoolroom of Unity Church to welcome the minister, the Rev. Dr. Hicks, M.A., and Mrs. Hicks, on the occasion of their marriage, and to make the presentation of a wedding gift, consisting of a silver tea and coffee service, a purse containing a cheque, together with an address, subscribed for by the congregation. The schoolroom had been very tastefully decorated by the Ladies' Committee, and several musical selections were rendered by members of the choir. The presentation was made by Mr. J. T. Preston, who referred in feeling terms to his very long friendship with Mrs. Hicks's family, and to their active association with the church. His intimate knowledge of Mrs. Hicks enabled him to appreciate her sterling qualities, and the keen interest she has always taken in the doings of the church and schools, of the latter of which she has for some years acted as treasurer. His intercourse with Dr. Hicks was confined to the five years of the latter's ministry at Unity Church, but during that period many lasting friendships had been formed, and it was apparent from the spontaneity which had prompted the presentation of the testimonial that Dr. Hicks had endeared himself to all the members of his congregation by his kindly sympathy and wide culture. Mr. Preston then made the presentation to Dr. and Mrs. Hicks with heartiest congratulations and sincere good wishes for their future happiness. In reply, Dr. Hicks said, on behalf of his wife and himself, that in their future life together the kindly feeling of his congregation would always remain a cherished memory. This welcome reminded him of that which was accorded him five years ago, when he settled in Islington. During the period which had intervened the ministerial portion of the church's work had been done by one, but he was sure that, with the help which he would now receive from his wife, and the goodwill of the congregation, he could with confidence look forward to the future success of the cause which all his hearers had so much at heart. In conclusion, Dr. Hicks said: "I am deeply grateful to you all for the kind presents you have made to us, and I can assure you we shall prize them much and always think of the members of Unity Church as dear and cherished friends."

Macclesfield (Welcome Meeting).—On Wednesday, April 23, a well-attended conversazione was held in the King Edward-street Schoolroom to welcome the Rev. W. G. Cadman as minister of the chapel. Mr. W. B. Brocklehurst, J.P., C.C., presided, and was supported by the Mayor, Mr. Alderman F. Hill, who wore his chain of office, the Rev. W. J. J. Barkell (Wesleyan), Principal Gordon, the Revs. H. E. Dowson, W. Copeland Bowie, A. Rushton, B. C. Constable, E. L. H. Thomas, W. Reynolds, G. H. Smith, and W. G. Cadman; Messrs. S. Coppock, S. Smith, and W. H. Mason. After the Chairman's opening address, the Mayor offered a welcome to Mr. Cadman on behalf of the town, and said he remembered being taken by his father to hear that highly-cultured and venerable man, the late Samuel Greg, than whom Macclesfield had never produced a nobler man. He wished the congregation happiness under their new minister. The Rev. W. J. J. Barkell offered a very cordial welcome on behalf of the Free Church ministers of the town. They had, he said, a very fine Temperance organisation in Macclesfield, and should warmly welcome Mr. Cadman's co-operation—and there was other social work in which they could stand shoulder to shoulder. They rejoiced in the good feeling which existed among them, and trusted that Mr. Cadman would be strengthened for his work, and that his ministry would be a conspicuous success. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, on behalf of the ministers of the East Cheshire Union, wished Mr. Cadman God-speed in his work, and other ministers present joined in the welcome, Mr. Sidney Smith also speaking on behalf of the congregation. Mr. Cadman, in responding, expressed his special gratitude to the members of other denominations who were present, and to Mr. Barkell for his brotherly speech. He took it as a happy augury that he was invited to attend the induction of the new Vicar of Macclesfield, and he rejoiced to know that he had come among men who were disposed to be brothers. With regard to his ministry, all he could say was that he came with the simple wish to be of service amongst them.

Manchester: Longsight.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The services both morning and evening were well attended. In the afternoon a musical service was held, when choral selections were given by the choir, and solos rendered by Miss Nellie Leeson and Mr. Roland Hoyle. On the Monday evening following Mr. Hopps lectured in the church, his subject being "What then is it to be a Christian?" ("Magna est veritas, et prevalebit.")

Monyrea.—An entertainment of a most enjoyable and varied character was given in the schoolhouse on Tuesday evening, April 22. The programme of music and humorous dialogue concluded with a comedietta, A Breezy Morning. The Rev. R. Lyttle presided, and an enthusiastic vote of thanks was accorded to the visitors who had taken part in the performance. "Auld Lang Syne" brought the proceedings to a close.

Mossley.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday last, in the morning and evening by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A., and in the afternoon by the Rev. C. E. Oliver, B.A. The collections amounted to £41.

North-East Lancashire Sunday School Union.—A successful conference in connection with this Union was held on Saturday last at Rawtenstall. The chair was taken by Mr. Thomas Kenyon, and a paper read by Mr. J. S. Mackie, of Burnley, his subject being "The Church in Relation to Human Needs." Mr. Mackie urged that as religion still holds a foremost place in the lives of men, it was essential that the Church should be in the van in all things tending to the uplifting of mankind. The Church must have a distinct message on such qestions as gambling and intemperance, and above all it must be free from all taint of sacerdotalism or priestcraft. A discussion followed, in which the Rev. W. H. Burgess, Messrs. P. Bibby, Hargreaves, Pinnington, Graham and Monk took part.

North Lancashire and Westmorland Unitarian Association.—A choral convention was held at St. Nicholas-street Church, Lancaster, on Saturday last. Representatives were present from Blackpool (South Shore), Chorley, Kendal, and Preston. In the afternoon a large party was conducted through Lancaster Castle, and treated, among other things, to interesting but gruesome chapters in penology. At 4.30 tea was served in St. Nicholas-street schoolroom. Fully 150 sat down to it. Shortly after six the main proceedings were commenced in the chapel, the President of the Association, the Rev. H. V. Mills, being in the chair. A hearty vote of thanks to the Lancaster friends for their warm hospitality and admirable arrangements was moved by Mr. Mills, and responded to by a member of the Lancaster congregation. A programme was then given by the united musical talents of the associated congregations. Glees, anthems and solos were sung, the crowning feature of the programme being Gounod's "Send out Thy Light," beautifully sung by the united choirs. The conductor was Mr. Robert Hall, conductor of the Lancaster choir. Mr. W. Delves presided at the organ. The proceedings terminated with the singing of "Glory to Thee, my God, this Night." The convention was greatly enjoyed, and was a splendid success. The next meeting of the Association will be at Kendal on June 28.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—A pleasant social evening was held on Thursday, April 24. After tea, and an enjoyable organ recital given by Mr. George Wragg in the chapel, a public meeting was held in the Channing Hall. Mr. J. G. Lowood presided, and amongst those supporting him were the Revs. J. E. Manning, J. E. Jenkins, W. Blazeby, W. Stevens (Rotherham), Iden Payne (Stannington), and H. Thomas (Doncaster), Messrs. E. Langton, W. Bramley, H. Fisher, &c. The principal event of the evening was an address by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was briefly welcomed by the chairman and the Rev. I. Payne. In the course of his address, Mr. Bowie said that by signs and tokens up and down the country, and in every part of the globe, Unitarians—and he did not say it in any boastful spirit—found that they were on the side that was making progress in the direction of liberty of thought and the highest and noblest conceptions. He urged that they should take more interest not only in their own church and its work—which was of essential and supreme importance—but in the work of the denomination as a whole, and in their chapels and ministers who, in some districts, often had to struggle amid great difficulties and isolation. It was of the greatest importance that they should present their gospel with perfect frankness—in as straightforward, earnest, and clear a way as they possibly could to the world. Round about them there was not only doubt and religious perplexity, but a great deal of indifference to religion. Unitarians had a message to the world. They urged men that it was their duty to God, as well as to themselves not to be afraid of truth, wherever it might come from, but to welcome it openly, fearlessly, gladly, and frankly, and to feel sure that in following the truth they would be led nearer to God, and not further from Him. That was their answer to those who bid them shut their eyes to the progress of modern knowledge, science, criticism, and the rest. They urged men to follow the truth, to obey their consciences, to rise to the highest and noblest conceptions they were capable of forming, and to cultivate that religious spirit, reverence, and piety without which life would lose its sweetness, charm, and beauty. Mr. Bowie was followed by the Revs. W. Stevens, H. Thomas, and J. E. Jenkins, who also gave short addresses. At intervals during the evening an enjoyable musical programme was rendered by the chapel choir, accompanied on the piano by Mr. Wragg, and an admirable reading was given by Mrs. Sinclair.

Southend.—The annual congregational meeting of the Unitarian Church was held at the close of the evening service last Sunday, Mr. C. F. Dear in the chair, and there was a large attendance of members. Reports as to the general work, Sunday-school, and Social Union, and the treasurer's statement, showed all departments of the church to be in a healthy spiritual and financial condition. Mr. Dear's engagement having terminated, he received a cordial and unanimous invitation to retain his position until the next annual general meeting, which was acceded to. A new constitution was adopted by the congregation, and the usual officials and nine general committeemen were elected for the ensuing year. A resolution condemnatory of the Government Education Bill was passed without a dissentient.

Swansea.—On the occasion of the 213th anniversary of the High-street Church, the services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., of Oxford, who took for the subject of his evening sermon "The Bible in the Light of Modern Knowledge." There was a large congregation, and the sermon made a deep impression. Having noted the progress of Old Testament criticism, Mr. Carpenter turned to the New, and referred especially to three lives of Christ, by the late Archbishop Thompson in 1863, Canon Sanday in 1893, and the late Dr. Bruce in 1901. As to the miraculous setting of the story, he showed what was to be learnt from the remarkable parallel of the life of Gautama, the Buddha, 500 years before Christ. In conclusion, he said that one fact testified to the spiritual greatness of Jesus, and that was the condition of the early Church. There was clear proof in the Gospels of his eminence as the creator of spiritual endeavour, but Christ was not the first upon the scene. He belonged to a movement; already there was the prophet John crying, "Repent, for the kingdom of Heaven is at hand." He drew a vivid picture of "the young man Jesus," who, fired by religious zeal, joins the movement only to suffer trials and disappointments and death. And yet was not Christendom right? Did it not still say in spite of that hour of gloom and desolation (in Gethsemane) that the Cross was the supreme manifestation of self-sacrificing love, the symbol of victory even in defeat, the sublimest emblem of our love and trust?

Taunton.—A congregational tea-meeting was held in the Mary-street schoolroom on Thursday week, and was well attended. The Rev. G. V. Crook presided, supported by the Revs. T. B. Broadrick and E. Parry. The Chairman gave a humorous and interesting address, and was followed by Mr. Parry, who, referring to the liberalism of many orthodox churches, said that sometimes when he read Biblical criticism written by Church of England divines it made his hair, heterodox as he was, stand on end when he remembered to what they had subscribed. Although he did not think numbers were altogether a measure of success, he thought Unitarians were too inclined to be satisfied with their present numbers. The Rev. T. B. Broadrick congratulated the Mary-street congregation on their decided improvement in numbers and in spirit, and upon the bright and happy meeting which they were having that evening. Let their ambition be great. According to the height of that ambition, and according as their hearts were given to it, so he was sure they would succeed. The spirit of brotherhood was vital to them, and they had no success there or in any part of the country until they put on one side for ever the spirit of lazy indifference. They must make their opinion one with that of their minister and their friend, and take their stand shoulder to shoulder. They must also encourage their minister by letting him know that they appreciated him. Mr. George Philpott next spoke of the various activities of the congregation, and other speeches followed, a musical programme also adding to the enjoyment of the evening.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, CARLISLE.

This Congregation is holding a BAZAAR on MAY 29 and 30. An effort is being made to raise £200, to wipe off an accumulated adverse balance, to pay for repairs caused by the collapse of the heating apparatus, and for other purposes, details whereof have been submitted to, and approved by, the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association. That Association heartily endorses the Appeal. There is no debt on the Church premises, and during the past year a Minister's house has been given by a Member. The Congregation is putting forth every effort, but being almost entirely a working-class congregation, and being in such an isolated position in the centre of a small population, is reluctantly forced to seek outside assistance. The cause is a growing one, its Local Income having more than doubled during the last eight years. The Rev. James Harwood has kindly consented to the publication of the following:—

105, Palace-road, London, S.W.
Feb. 28, 1902.

Last autumn I paid a visit to Carlisle at the request of the Committee of the B. and F. U. Association, and was much impressed by the courage and effectiveness with which Mr. Travers and his people are "holding the fort" in that isolated Outpost of our Faith. They deserve, and I trust will receive, the sympathy and substantial assistance of our friends in other parts of the country.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A LETTER from the Secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, with regard to the attendance at the Whit-week meetings and hospitality, appears in another column, and we have also published a programme of the meetings of various societies, from which it will be seen that the week promises to be of great interest. We are glad to hear that a large attendance of friends from all parts of the country is expected. Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall lecture cannot fail to be a notable utterance, and a special interest should attach to the series of papers to be read on Thursday morning on "Types of Religious Experience," in which the following ministers will speak of what they know :—

Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington : "Anglican to Unitarian."
Rev. William Wooding, B.A., London : "Congregationalist to Unitarian."
Rev. G. V. Crook, of Taunton : "Methodist to Unitarian."
Rev. Alex. Webster, of Aberdeen : "Presbyterian to Unitarian."
Rev. L. de B. Klein, D.Sc., of Liverpool : "Roman Catholic to Unitarian."

The Sunday-school breakfast, it will be noted, is this year only for the President's invited guests, but the annual meeting and conference, which are to follow, are, of course, open to all who are interested in Sunday-school work.

THE annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society, which is to be held next Wednesday evening, at the Portland Schools in Little Titchfield-street, will, we trust, be largely attended. There can be no surer test of the vitality of the religious life in our churches than the earnest prosecution of this work among the poor of our great city. The chair is to be taken at eight o'clock by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, and the speakers are to include the Revs. James C. Street, F. H. Jones and Henry Gow.

WE were not able to record last week the conclusion of the Baptist Union Meetings, but Friday was a great day for the brethren of the Union. Two days before, they had been more than £5,000 short of the quarter of a million aimed at for their Twentieth Century Fund, but on the Wednesday evening Mr. John Chivers handed to the secretary, the Rev. J. H. Shakespeare, a letter in which he promised on behalf of members and friends of his family a donation of £5,000, in memory of the late William Chivers. Needing then only £326 to make up the balance of the quarter of a million, Mr. Shakespeare at once telegraphed to a friend down in Devonshire and promptly received a reply message promising that amount. Indeed it was promised twice over, 'and ultimately shared between two friends. When at noon on Friday Mr. Shakespeare announced that the Fund was complete a great wave of enthusiasm and thankfulness swept over the assembly, and the Doxology was sung with deep feeling. The four Presidents of the Union, who have been in office during the progress of the great effort—the Revs. Samuel Vincent, Dr. Clifford, W. Cuff, and Dr. McLaren—were called upon in turn to address the assembly, and Dr. McLaren received a great ovation. Both he and Dr. Clifford spoke with deep emotion. Dr. Clifford said that was one of the greatest hours in the history of the Baptist Denomination ; their experience seemed to be summed up in the expression of the deepest thankfulness to God, and a petition for the spirit of wisdom in using the Fund. Dr. McLaren's was the last speech, after which the Doxology was again sung, and the Benediction brought a memorable meeting to a close.

MR. JOHN CHIVERS, in announcing his family's donation of £5,000 to the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund, expressed a wish that it might be set apart as the nucleus of a Baptist Sustentation Fund, which might carry into effect his brother's last great wish. On Friday this matter of a Sustentation Fund was brought forward in an elaborate paper by the Rev. W. E. Blomfield based on a draft scheme found among the papers of the late William Chivers. The scheme follows the lines of the Presbyterian Fund, to which all churches are to contribute and from which all recognised ministers would receive a minimum stipend. The need of the Fund was strongly emphasised, in view of the large number of ministers at present receiving less than £150 a year. The paper, the proposals of which were very favourably received, was referred to the Committee for consideration, and it is published for wide distribution.

THE Murphy Memorial Hall, in the New Kent-road, which was opened last Saturday by Miss Morley (daughter of the late Samuel Morley) is to be devoted to religious, social and educational work, temperance reform being a special feature, in the midst of a most needy neighbourhood. It is a memorial to a faithful Congregational minister, the late Rev. G. M. Murphy, who was at one time connected with the missions of Christ Church, Westminster-bridge-road, and then for many years laboured as minister of the Borough-road Congregational Chapel. The hall, which is built of brick, and is lighted with electricity, and will seat nearly a thousand people, has been erected at a cost of £7,000, of which the half has been already raised. Mr. Arnold S. Tayler is the architect, and on Saturday handed over the key to Miss Morley at the opening ceremony. A sermon was subsequently preached by the Rev. C. Silvester Horne, and the Rev. F. B. Meyer spoke a few words of warm appreciation of the work of the Rev. J. Fuller, the present minister in charge of the work at the hall and at the neighbouring Congregational Chapel.

THE annual meeting of the London Anti-Vivisection Society was held on Monday evening at the Queen's Hall, Sir A. Arnold in the chair, and that of the National Society on Tuesday evening, in St. James's Hall, the chair being taken by Archdeacon Basil Wilberforce, in the absence through illness of Lord Llangattock, the president. The report of the London Society expressed the conviction that vivisection is "hopelessly demoralising to the public conscience inasmuch as it tends to lead people to regard as justifiable that which involves cruelty, injustice and oppression." The practice, therefore, was not only a cruel wrong to helpless animals but a menace to the moral progress of the race. At the meeting of the National Society, Archdeacon Wilberforce said that one of the difficulties that beset their movement was the passive obedience of the public to a blind sacerdotalism in this matter, and another was a certain honourable esprit de corps in the medical profession, which prevented many from speaking out against the prevailing opinion. Tuesday's Daily News had the following editorial note :—

The London Anti-Vivisection Society—one of the several societies that have been established with the object of obtaining the legislative suppression of cruel methods of research—obtained a very influential "platform" at its annual meeting yesterday. It is idle to speak of the opponents of vivisection as "hysterical women," in the face of such testimony as that of yesterday. Indeed, perhaps the strongest denouncers of vivisection at the meeting were members of the medical and surgical professions. Dr. Hadwen pointed out that there was no science in vivisection : its results have been generally contradictory and misleading, due to the abnormal conditions in which its subjects were placed. But the strongest ground on which it is opposed is the demoralisation of the vivisector. Of this demoralisation the language in which eminent experimenters describe their experiments affords ample proof. The present Vivisection Act is unsatisfactory on many grounds : the inspection under it is a sham, and the public have no guarantee that its provisions—ineffective as they are—are observed. The matter is one that calls for further legislation.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.—The third annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Monday last, the president, the Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury, occupying the chair. The annual report expressed increased confidence in the financial stability and useful prospects of the Society. The financial statement showed that the amount invested was £203 12s. 3d., and that the worth of the Society was £256 15s. 7d. Thirteen new members were elected, bringing the total membership up to 98. Resolutions of sympathy were adopted in consequence of the deaths of the Rev. Joseph Harrison and the Rev. Dr. Vance Smith, and of the retirement through failing health of the Rev. Thomas Leyland. The Rev. S. A. Steinthal was elected president for the ensuing year; the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., was re-elected treasurer, and the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., secretary. Vacancies on the committee were filled by the election of the Revs. P. M. Higginson, M.A., and James C. Street; Mr. A. E. Piggott and the Rev. W. R. Shanks were re-elected as auditors, and Mr. John Dendy as legal adviser. Following an instruction from the annual meeting of last year, the Committee presented a special report on suggestions as to methods of further mutual help which the Fellowship might profitably adopt. The various suggestions were very carefully considered, and some modifications were made in the rules in consequence. The rule which defines the objects of the Fellowship now reads as follows :—"The first object of the Fellowship shall be the establishment of a fund or funds to assist in the support of members, entitled under the rules, who are temporarily without ministerial charge. The second object shall be to afford counsel, sympathy, and brotherly aid to such members as may be found to need them. The third object shall be to give counsel to ministers of other denominations desiring to enter into fellowship with our churches."

Correspondents are requested to note that to be sure of insertion the same week, news must reach the Office by the first post on Thursday at latest, and the earlier in the week the better.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

SIR,—Will you allow me to say that invitations were sent out to the secretaries of all congregations in the "Essex Hall Year Book," inviting the minister and a representative of the Church and of the Sunday-school to be present at the Whit-week Meetings in London. Programmes and tickets have now been forwarded to all who have intimated their intention of being present; and I shall esteem it a favour if any minister or delegate who has been overlooked will at once inform me.

Hospitality was offered to ministers of congregations requiring it, if application was made not later than May 6. I am now in communication with hostesses in and near London, and I hope, in the course of a few days, to make the necessary arrangements. The ministers will be informed of the arrangements made by May 17.

If this letter should meet the eye of any lady willing to entertain a minister (or a minister and his wife) during the Meetings, I hope she will write to me at Essex Hall.

The Meetings promise to be full of interest, and the committee will be pleased to welcome people from near and from far. A complete programme of proceedings will be forwarded to any address on application to Mr. Philip Green.

W. COPELAND BOWIE (Secretary).
Essex Hall, London, May 7.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION BREAKFAST AND ANNUAL MEETING.

SIR,—I desire to inform the representatives of Sunday Schools and Sunday School Societies that invitations to the breakfast, given by Lady O'Hagan, President of the Association, on Tuesday morning, May 20, have been sent to all those whose names have reached me. If by some unforeseen accident any delegate has not received an invitation, I shall be glad to have the name forwarded to me at once.

May I also be allowed to remind your readers that the Business Meeting and Conference are open, without ticket, to anyone interested in our work.

THE HOUSING PROBLEM AND THE LAND QUESTION.

WE published last week two letters addressed by the Rev. Priestley Prime to the Manchester City News. The following is a third and concluding letter of the series, which appeared in the same paper on Saturday, April 26th :—

SIR,—I feel sure that the letters from me which you have published have shown to reasonable readers the necessity of a working wage being paid to all labourers and artisans, not only for their own advantage, but in the interest of their employers also. I have mentioned the purchasing power of wages as the real test of their amount, because it is obvious that the same nominal wage might allow a fairly healthy and pleasant life in one district, while in another, when food cost half as much again, and house rent was quadrupled, it might mean a bare subsistence amid very unhealthy conditions.

The cost of food and clothing might be materially altered so as to give higher purchasing power to the same wages if railway companies charged lower rates for bringing country produce into the towns, if a larger proportion of the people lived country lives, or if taxation were less heavy and more wise than seems likely yet awhile. But, dealing with present conditions, we find that the heaviest tax levied upon the homes of the poor and of the better-paid working-men is usually included in house rent. Many of them pay three or four times as much for their houses as is representative of any interest recognised as a fair return on the money the actual house is worth—its cost of building, less the amount of depreciation. Or, to put the matter in another way, a man paying 8s. a week for a house in some parts of Manchester could get for half the money a far better house if he could live somewhere at a distance from Manchester, where life would be more healthy for himself and his family. Because many are compelled to live near their work, and that work is in Manchester, they must get their houses at any price they can possibly afford to pay rather than lose their work, and must put up with unhealthy and unpleasant conditions and degrading influences which they would not choose of their own free will.

I am not concerned to discuss now how much of this tax goes to the ground landlord, who certainly has a large share, and has the most complete security. I merely want to point out that if the slums and overcrowded areas of our great towns are to be adequately dealt with, so long as our towns continue to grow, it will be absolutely necessary to do away with this tax, or minimise it, and in order to make any lasting improvement in the condition of even a part of the dwellers in our towns, something must be done to prevent new districts, suburban or otherwise, growing up with no advantage over the old save their newness and temporary proximity to the country. Both these advantages, though attractive to the first tenants, speedily disappear as the whole district gets covered with houses, which, badly built and badly arranged, fall into decay, and the growth of the town brings up the landlord's tax if it has not been imposed to the full at the time of building. Around Manchester at the present time many districts are being covered with houses which are certainly destined to become slums or overcrowded areas in the future, if the present methods are continued.

Better bye-laws and a more stringent application of them may have some modifying influence over the evil. Every restriction on the licence of the landowner in the use of the land is an advantage. When the municipal authorities purchase a tract of land and lay it out with some regard to the health and happiness of the future residents, though they be working people, there is some gain over present conditions. The action of employers like Messrs. Lever Brothers, at Port Sunlight, shows what can be done by those who take a generous view of their relationship to their employés and have a far-sighted perception of their own means of success. Garden cities, or tracts of land not large enough to build cities upon, but sufficient to group together some workmen's dwellings in a pleasant way with breathing space and gardens and trees, will reduce the congestion at the centre, and make possible for many a better and brighter life than they live now. For it must be remembered that there is a considerable number of steady working people who could afford to pay the rents charged at Bournville, but who at present, while paying such rents or higher charges, are obliged to live in circumstances which form a violent and gloomy contrast to those of the dwellers in the city founded by Mr. Cadbury.

In these and other reforms one principle must always be borne in mind, or the rent difficulty will remain as keen as ever. The ground must be secured from the grip of the money-making landlord. Whoever holds the title deeds of the land has, under present land laws, the power of charging the full amount of unearned increment due to the increased number of residents, the growth of population around, and the demand for living and working space, unless he has effectively bound himself not to do so. The advantages of a garden city or other improved area are of two kinds ; first, better houses, more thoroughly and less closely built, with more beauty of design and pleasanter surroundings ; and, secondly, lower rents. The latter may not continue, though the price paid for the land be only its agricultural value, if the managers or owners have power to increase the rents with the increasing value of the land. When more people come to it, the land will have a higher value, and if higher rents are not charged it will be because the estate is not managed for profit merely.

Although each benevolent landlord who recognises his duty to his tenants as their guardian and helper in return for their rent, helps towards a better condition, and although every garden city and well-managed municipal housing scheme—and indeed every owner of small house property who considers the tenants' welfare of more account than his own profit—reduce the evil, it is hardly likely that it will be abolished or reduced to such an extent as to allow of healthy and pleasant homes as the normal condition in England, unless there be some such alteration of the land laws as shall recognise the right of the community as superior to those of any landlord. To me it seems to be a fair and reasonable requirement which ought to be enforced by law, that every owner of land should be responsible for the sanitary and wholesome condition of every house on the land from which he draws his revenue. The enormous privileges of the landowners surely carry with them this obligation, and also that each landowner should find sufficient accommodation for those who are obliged to live within the area which he is permitted to own.

There is pressing need for action, and whatever will bring about an immediate improvement, even on a small scale, is worthy of encouragement ; but the general and lasting solution of the housing problem can come only through the public ownership of land, or the recognition of the rights and needs of the people living and working on the land as prior to the privileges of the landowner.

LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY FOR THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—I need not say that I gratefully welcomed your kind suggestion that I should write a second letter to your columns in order to explain further what it is that our Society hopes to do.

First of all, as you suggest, we desire to make an object lesson for the nation. It is well known that, in our country, all social reforms are initiated by private effort; when they are successful, then they are adopted by the Government. Instances of this, such as the Reformatories and Industrial Schools, will occur to everybody. The social reform for which we ask is the rational treatment of those who are weak in intellect. There is no doubt that the main cause of Feebleness of Mind is Heredity. We, who believe this—believe it because of incontrovertible proof—claim that our object is to force upon the public a great new principle of right-doing. We exist for nothing less than that. We demand the recognition of our Duty to the Future and the immediate action appropriate to such recognition. We demand the stoppage of the transmission to the Future of a terrible evil, an evil which brings all other evils in its train. It is not only that our weaker brethren themselves become criminals, they afford the opportunity for crime in others who are not weak but only bad. There is no kind of crime which is not frequently the consequence of deficiency of intellect. It is probable that two-thirds of the crime of our country might be prevented, in the course of two generations, by a scientific method of dealing with the Feeble-minded. We must remember, too, that it is futile to talk of weak-minded criminals as sinners. Sin there must be, where so much crime and misery are, but the sin lies where the responsibility lies, and that is with every sane person who knows of these things and does nothing to prevent them. We want to make people realise how terribly weakness of intellect is on the increase, and to that end we are trying to collect and spread abroad all reliable information on the subject. It is not generally known how widely spread this evil is and what large families its victims become parents of. Amos. W. Butler, Secretary to the States Charities of Indiana, read a paper before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, in which he gives some very startling statistics of this question. Amongst others he quotes the case of a weak-minded man who had twenty children. Mr. Butler has given me leave to print his paper for circulation, and I will send a copy of it to any one who will send me sixpence.

But, Sir, whilst pressing our principles, we do not wish to neglect to put them in practice. Hence our schools at Sandlebridge. Our scheme embraces four schools—one for infants, one for boys, one for girls, and one for adults. We began with those for boys and girls—they were the most pressing—they are just ready now; we shall send some boys in, in the middle of this month, and, I hope, some girls next month. They are not yet quite paid for, and that troubles me. I do not think Societies ought to get into debt, and we shall if we do not raise our money by the end of June. But already your readers have sent me £70, and perhaps some more will come, and I shall reach the £500 I am asking for. When Pastor Bodelschwingh was opening his "Baby Castle," a home for 100 little epileptic girls, he longed to open it free of debt, and he put out an appeal: "Let all parents send one penny as a thank-offering for every healthy child they have." In one fortnight he received 400,000 pennies. Nor have such thank-offerings been wanting to me. One gift came: "From a young mother. A thank-offering for my baby-boy's health and strength." And one working-woman said to me: "I've six healthy children, so there's a shilling for you."

Will not our happy fathers and mothers try to help these little ones, whose parents, too often, are not in a condition bodily or mentally to help them? We shall take children from all over Lancashire and Cheshire. I wish we could go further afield, but space and funds are so limited. Some day, we hope every county will have its happy schools for weak-minded children to work and play in to the end of their days. Meantime, appeals for advice and help reach me from all over the country; it is a great part of my work to consider all these appeals and advise upon them; and it is very, very sad that, owing to lack of proper accommodation, advice and sympathy are often all I can give. It is hard to have to tell an anxious mother or father, "There is no place for your child," and to hear the constant query, "What's to become of him when I'm gone?"

That brings me to another aspect of the question; and with that I must close. Within one month lately I have had referred to me six cases, all youths between the ages of eighteen and twenty-four. One is the son of a vicar in the East of England, one of a solicitor in the North, two others are sons of people just fairly off, two are the sons of poor parents; all these young men, if placed in proper surroundings and under proper supervision, could earn their own living, but they are too weak in intellect to work alone. One I have, I hope, provided for. It is an experiment I am trying, but I hope it will succeed. For the others there is no place. If I had the money, I should take a farm and put them, all together, under the care of a good man, upon it. These poor weaklings have a special fondness for animals; they should raise pigs and poultry, and grow vegetables and fruit; they should live largely on the produce of the farm; they would be safe and happy, and, beyond the first expense, there would not be need for much outside help—in money, that is. Is there no one who would take this piece of work in hand?

I must not trespass further on your space. I will only ask once more, for the sake of the healthy children, please help these weaklings. MARY DENDY.

GOD'S SACRIFICE.

SIR,—My respect for Mr. Herford's opinion makes me glad that he agrees with my belief that "the spiritual universe is the product of God's self-giving love." Such an admission, in my opinion, makes "the idea of sacrifice on the part of God intelligible."

But Mr. Herford does not agree to this, because he "thinks that a sacrifice necessarily involves suffering" and "Deity cannot suffer." The argument is thus shifted from God's sacrifice to God's suffering, and with your permission I would say a few words upon this great subject. Mr. Herford does not believe in a God who is indifferent to human suffering; he attributes sympathy to God, and derives great comfort from the thought. "I can only say that I find great comfort in the thought of the sympathy of God; but I should find none at all if I thought that my trouble was in the same sense, and in the same degree His trouble." I quite agree with Mr. Herford here. Sympathy certainly means to suffer with another, and to attribute sympathy to God is to admit that Deity can suffer; but the sympathiser, though suffering with the person he sympathises with, does not suffer in exactly the same sense.

A kind father sympathises with the trouble of his little child; but the child's trouble is not "in the same sense and in the same degree his trouble." The Bible not only reveals a God who suffers through sympathy, it also asserts a God who suffers on account of sin. Yahveh is spoken of as "long-suffering," as grieved for the sin of Israel; Paul bids his readers "grieve not the Holy Spirit of God"; and if the revelation of God in Christ reveals anything, it surely reveals the suffering of God on account of sin.

Because I believe in a God who can sympathise, I believe that Deity can suffer; because I believe in a God who is grieved on account of sin, I believe that Deity can suffer. The witness of Holy Scripture and the witness of my own heart compel me to reject that stilted formula—"Deity cannot suffer"

CLEMENT E. PIKE.

[What Mr. Pike calls a "stilted formula" occurs in the following concluding passage of Dr. Martineau's sermon "That the Christ ought to suffer," (Hours of Thought," II., p. 130). In the same sermon there is another reference to "the grandeur and serenity of God, who ever acts and never suffers."—ED. INQ.]

We recoil from all affliction ere it comes: our cross appears too heavy to be borne; and in the Gethsemane of our anguish we cry aloud in darkness; and as oft as we sob, and pray, we still say the same words, "let this cup pass from us!" But when we have been led away and passed the dreadful hour, and see it all in retrospect, not with the eye of mortal fear, but with the glance of a diviner wisdom, we comprehend how we ought to have suffered these things, and wonder at our former doubts, and try, perhaps in vain, to convey to others the tranquil persuasion so deep within ourselves. May we not say, that these after-thoughts of our mortal grief are forethoughts of our immortal peace; showing under what fair and quiet aspect will then appear the stormiest passages of life; and how the very glory into which we have entered, came, like the rainbow, from the glow of God upon the chillest and blackest sky.

Even when we consider the Christ as the emblem of God, rather than the representative of man, it is not difficult to perceive why he ought to have suffered these things. Deity, it is true, cannot suffer; and the conflict and agony of Jesus can teach us no direct lesson of the Father who was with him; and it might even seem as if a total exemption from affliction would better, and with more of truth and majesty, have displayed to us the being whom he revealed. Yet surely, on nearer thought, we shall be convinced that mere immunity from pain would have given a very poor and a very false idea of God's elevation above vicissitudes. In the contemplation of a perfect being, it is not his outward removal beyond the reach and touch of ill, not his mere privilege of rank lifting him into a region free from harm—it is not this that gives us the strongest impression of his greatness. This is but natural or physical divinity; not its moral and spiritual majesty; it is the impassibility of a mind without emotion. And Christ has surely left us an image of something diviner far than this, in the power to quell and drown intense suffering with the flood of pure and sacred sympathies; in the transcendency of thought and tranquillity of faith, which the pulses of anguish vainly strove to reach and overwhelm; in his triumph over evil by simple and entire preoccupation of soul with duty, love and goodness. And meekly as his head was bowed upon the cross, never surely could an impression of more godlike power be left; never could evil appear more utterly baffled; never could guilt shrink more ashamed even from the eye of Omniscience itself, than when the prayer went forth, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." Victim as he was, he was the conqueror then; and all who realise his spirit may, in like extremity, become "more than conquerors through him that hath so loved them."

THE TEACHINGS OF DANTE.*

MR. DINSMORE'S book is an attempt to define the relation between Dante's religious teaching and what he (Mr. Dinsmore) regards as the highest religious life of our own day.

There is undoubtedly a wide public to whom such a work will appeal, for many readers who have always regarded themselves as good Protestants are a little perplexed when they find the "Comedy" becoming a sort of second Bible to them, and they will welcome an attempt—competent and, within its limits, sympathetic—to estimate the strength and the weakness of Dante's religious teaching, regarded not historically but on its own absolute merits, from the point of view of an enlightened modern Evangelical Protestantism.

"It is doubtless true," says Mr. Dinsmore, "that the 'Purgatorio' is one of the most deeply religious books in the world. Yet it still comes far short of embodying the loftiest spiritual ideals" (p. 137). The greater part of his book is devoted to expounding this "deeply religious" character of the "Comedy," but he devotes a few emphatic pages to what he speaks of as the "absence of Christ," which he regards as its great religious defect, and which he calls in Horace Bushnell to remedy.

Now there is a sense in which this "absence of Christ" must have impressed the modern reader not only of the "Comedy," but of many other great religious works of the Church before the Reformation. There is a similar "absence of Christ" in Augustine's "Confessions," and although Mr. Dinsmore boldly asserts that Bernard, whom Dante regarded with so much veneration, could not have left a "sense of sweet personal communion with Christ" so completely out of the "Purgatorio" and the "Paradiso" (p. 138), yet if he studies that Saint's treatise "On loving God," he will be startled to find a similar "absence of Christ" there too. The fact is that Augustine, Bernard, and Dante, all of them took their Trinitarianism seriously. Mr. Dinsmore and the modern Evangelical (sic) do not.

In the "Comedy" there is no "absence of Christ" as the Divine Personality the union in whom of the Two Natures was the absolutely essential condition for cancelling the "long-enduring ban of heaven." Faith in Christ and in the mystery of the incarnation are assumed or expressly insisted upon throughout the work. But it is perfectly true that we look in vain for a "sense of sweet personal communion with Christ" as distinguished from communion with God. How can there be such a distinction in the mind of a true homöousian? But if Mr. Dinsmore means to imply that Dante has no passionate personal love for a being at once human and raised above all human weakness, a being whose divine character is expressed in never-ceasing personal acts of tenderness to us, a being whose example can train us in every virtue, a being with whom living converse spontaneously purifies and exalts us, a being who once existed on earth and now exists in heaven, and whose identity is vouched by the "Christian consciousness" of the Church, a being "beloved and venerated" by God himself, and yet graciously and sweetly accessible to every human intimacy, a being in whom all may confide, to whom all may appeal—if Mr. Dinsmore thinks that Dante knows no such being, then his eyes are strangely blinded by sectarian prejudice, and the inability to recognise identity of experience when not proclaimed by identity of label; for the "Comedy" is an almost unbroken testimony to Dante's sense of sweet intercourse with such a Being, only the name he gives that Being is not Jesus, but Mary.

The type of religious experience into which converse with such a Being (however named) enters, is not universal. Neither the Hebrew prophets, nor the Hebrew psalmists, nor Jesus of Nazareth (not to speak of Aeschylus or Plato, Aristotle or Boethius) have conformed to it. These all, with their immense scope and variety of religious character, united in finding their highest spiritual life in such direct communion as they might severally attain with the Highest, and would presumably have rejected as idolatrous the conception of a being who should, so to speak, converse on a kind of equality alike with God and with man. Between those who do and those who do not give a place to such a Being in their religion there is a dividing line which the philosophical historian or student of religion can recognise; but Dante and Mr. Dinsmore stand upon the same side of it; and if it be really true that all Christians stand with them, then Christianity must be dated from the conversion of St. Paul, and Jesus of Nazareth must be ranked as the last Saint under the Old Covenant.

STUDIES IN POLITICAL AND SOCIAL ETHICS.*

THIS volume contains a number of articles previously published in the International Journal of Ethics, the Contemporary Review, and other periodicals. Though written at considerable intervals of time and adapted to different hearers, they are connected by an evident unity of tone and tendency. Readers of Professor Ritchie's former works will recognise here again the brilliancy of thought and charm of expression which fills even "dry" themes with living interest.

The papers in the volume before us deal with most of the "burning questions" of the day in political and social ethics. Their titles are: "Social Evolution," dealing chiefly with the characteristic differences between biological evolution and the evolution of human societies; "Equality," dealing with the truths and errors of the theory that men are "equal"; "Law and Liberty: the question of State Interference"; "Civic Duties and Party Politics"; "1792: Year I."—a study of the hopes and disappointments of the "new beginning" in France eleven decades ago; "War and Peace"; "The Ultimate Value of Social Effort"; "Free Will and Responsibility." Such a book is indeed welcome at the present time; for it can hardly fail to help a tendency whose faint beginnings can be discerned in the public mind—to treat politics "scientifically," that is, as a serious study with principles and methods of investigation which will lead to truth if intelligently followed. That a man's political "opinions" should depend on the interests of himself, or his "class," or his business connection—or that they should be the outcome of mere sentiment or prejudice—is a state of things no longer to be acquiesced in. It is unfortunate that most of the significant contributions to the scientific study of politics consist of volumes whose bulk and style are calculated to repel all who most need to be influenced by them. On this account we are able the more cordially to recommend Professor Ritchie's book.

The author takes his stand by two basal principles. One of these is more than ethical—it is at bottom religious: the necessity of faith in the real meaning and worth of human life and human history, which is implied in all serious political and social effort. The other principle is that this meaning of life must be realised by working for "the common good"—that being understood to mean the highest development of individual capacities compatible with the coherence and continuance of the society as a whole (p. 62). This gives us a thoroughly concrete object as a standard of political action. We must abandon the "abstract" political and ethical thinking which loves to theorise concerning the "natural rights" of men, or to appeal to "abstract" justice. Ours should be the concrete justice which regards only the effects of political action on the social character and civilisation of the communities concerned. Thus, in speaking of the moral problems of War, Professor Ritchie says:—

> I think it will be found that our judgments on the wars of the century from 1770 to 1870 turn very largely on the question, Which of the conflicting forces was making for constitutional government and social progress? or, to put it in wider terms, Which represented the higher civilisation? And thus it is that we may sometimes approve the rise of a new civilisation and sometimes the absorption of an old. . . . There is everywhere an inevitable conflict between inconsistent types of civilisation; and with human nature such as it is, and human governments such as they are, this conflict cannot always be kept in peaceful channels. Wars should never be judged as isolated phenomena. They are incidents or symptoms of larger movements. The divine right of kings and constitutional government—society based upon slavery and society based upon labour for wages—ecclesiastical domination and lay liberty—the principles of the Holy Alliance and the principles of the French Revolution—the statecraft of Metternich and the ideals of Mazzini—oppositions like these are irreconcilable, because they are the oppositions of different stages of human development; and compromises between them have only avoided war for the time being, sometimes at the cost of a more terrible struggle afterwards.

Amid the passion, prejudice, and sentiment that reign in the political world, a book like this is quite refreshing. It is not likely that many readers will agree with all the applications which Professor Ritchie makes of his fundamental principles; but it is safe to say that any reader will find the discussions stimulating, suggestive, and of great value.

OBITUARY.

JOHN SWANWICK.

THE veterans of our household of faith are fast passing away, and as we lose those who used to speak to us of remembering the Battle of Waterloo, we realise, as never before, that we have crossed the threshold of a new century.

In 1736 was born John Swanwick, of Wem, in Shropshire, the great-great-grandson of the Rev. Philip Henry, who was one of the ejected clergymen in 1662.

On May 11, 1808, ninety-four years ago, was born in Dublin another John Swanwick, grandson of the above, whose death on April 7 this year was lately recorded in THE INQUIRER,

This last John Swanwick was proud of his ancestry, especially of his two aunts, who lived to be ninety-six and ninety-nine respectively, and liked in his latter years to describe his early school-days, passed under the roof of his uncle and aunt Hutton in Dublin, and his coming to Manchester as a young man in 1830. He early became a teacher and superintendent in the Lower Mosley-street Schools, and at the time of his death was the oldest surviving trustee.

The Manchester Guardian, two days after his death, had the following notice of the oldest subscriber to the Manchester Exchange :—

Many Manchester men will, with an affectionate regard, be recalling him to mind. They delighted to refer to him as the "Father" of their Royal Exchange. It is some years since the directors paid him the unusual compliment of making him an honorary life member of the exchange in consideration of the fact that he was the oldest member as regards not only age but also years of membership. On the occasion of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee he presided over a great meeting of some 7,000 members, and was chosen to forward to the late Queen the resolution of congratulation that was enthusiastically passed. It is only two years or so since he last appeared upon the "boards," and it is said that it was only after years of kindly pressure that he was prevailed upon to give up his custom of coming daily into the city, such was his indomitable energy. On 'Change his figure was well known to all, and many a one would have felt that his day was incomplete had he left the "boards" without a handshake and a word with "old Mr. Swanwick." His enthusiasm for a good cause was often an inspiration to others, and an example especially to younger men. His moral indignation as expressed against some wrong-doing was at times calculated to put to shame the luke-warmness of those who heard him. He was a Radical of the old Manchester type and gloried in the fact to the end of his days.

In 1836 Mr. Swanwick married Miss Emma Ryland, whose sister was married to Mr. Herford, the father of the Rev. W. H. and Dr. Brooke Herford, and whose ancestor was also one of the ejected clergymen in 1662. Ten or twelve years later he went out to live at Alderley Edge, and in the home where three of his four children were born, surrounded by his daughter's children, he passed peacefully the last two or three years of his life in the house of his son-in-law, Mr. Thomas Worthington. After the death of his wife in April, 1885, he had made his home with his eldest son at Lymm, near Warrington.

When the old chapel at Dean-row was re-opened for service during the ministry of the Rev. John Colston, he became a regular member of the congregation, and for many years he walked the seven miles to and fro every Sunday. For some years he was treasurer to the congregation. He used to tell, with some amusement, how as a youth he went with his aunt, Mrs. Hutton, to hear Dr., then Mr. Martineau, preach his first sermon in Eustace-street Chapel, Dublin, and how his aunt, who was generally very shrewd in her judgments, declared at dinner afterwards that "that poor young man would never earn an income as a preacher, he was so very much in the clouds!"

We referred at the beginning of this notice to the grandfather of the last John Swanwick—Mr. John Swanwick of Wem. Some of his other grandchildren bear names well known to the readers of THE INQUIRER: Dr. Hutton, of Derby, father of Joseph Henry, John and Richard Holt Hutton (the late editor of the Spectator); Mary Hutton, who died at Fairfield, near Dublin, at the age of ninety-five, and whose memory is always green to those who knew her; Sarah Andrews, who married Dr. Drennan, of Comber, near Belfast, and died there lately at the age of ninety-five; Mrs. Bruce, who was born in 1810, and her sister, Miss Anna Swanwick, an LL.D. of Aberdeen University, who died within a few weeks of one another in 1899; and Charles Wicksteed, whose son and grandson are still with us and hold an honourable place in the annals of our ministry.

Charles Wicksteed was an intimate cousin and early friend of the John Swanwick of this notice, whose great pleasure it was, during the last months of her life, to exchange affectionate messages with his cousin, Anna Swanwick. May their descendants be as faithful to the legacies handed down to them, and as loyal to old ties of family and friendship, as these cousins ever were.

IN THE ACADEMY.

"DREARY again, this year as last," was the first impression of a quiet view of the pictures in the Royal Academy Exhibition which opened to the public on Monday. And it was perhaps foolish, in this time of reaction and confused moral issues and debased ideals, to have any other expectation; yet we cannot altogether abandon the hope that some day new light will arise, and a breath of fresh inspiration will come to British art. As it is, some of our old men continue, indeed, to dream their old dreams: Peter Graham among the sea-birds of his rocky coast, or with his highland cattle on the cloud-swept hills; Goodall in the desert or on the banks of the Nile; MacWhirter, not this year among the silver birches, but his more recent dream of romantic Switzerland; Leader, with little variation, among his long familiar places; but where are our young men who can see visions and lift up our people to a loftier ideal? As we asked that question of the hundreds of oil-paintings gathered in strange medley, we were mocked by many obtrusive things, the King's resplendent uniform in the regulation portrait, and in almost every room, as it seemed to us, a number of gorgeous ladies' dresses, arranged on satin cushions or variously displayed in graceful attitudes; but for a vision of perfect beauty we had to wait until we had escaped into the open air, and on the last evening of April saw the sunset light on the trees and across the lake in St. James's Park.

In the Academy we found no touch of inspiration; and yet on a second visit, perhaps in a fresher morning hour, there seemed to be more pictures that could give some real pleasure, and certainly in the Water-colour Room, so often a welcome refuge from the turmoil of more ambitious haunts, there are some beautiful things. Among them, the President's picture of "Duart Castle" (842), though the castle is the least part of it; Mr. W. G. Collingwood's "Winter at Coniston" (879), exquisite in its glimpse of pine-wood and snowy crag, and with an added personal interest for lovers of Ruskin; and Mr. A. R. Quinton's "Thames Valley" (799). Nos. 826, 870, 878, 880, 938, and 954 we also marked with pleasure, and found a special interest in "Strath Fillan" (815), by Mr. Ernest Briggs, and "Where oak and birch-tree grow" (872), by Mr. W. Follen Bishop.

Of the greater landscapes Yeend King's "Heron's Pool on the Lledr" (425), Charles Stuart's "Loch Katrine" (718), Alfred East's "Gibraltar" (733), with Joseph Farquharson's Winter scenes (36 and 213), and D. Farquharson's "Gloom and Sunshine" (93), seemed among the best.

There are also a considerable number of pictures of human interest of various degree, such as Stanhope Forbes's "Lighting-up Time" (40), I. Snowman's "Children's Voices" (377), J. R. Reid's "The Pilot's Peepshow" (381), and W. L. Wyllie's "Pushing down the Flood" (472), a fine river scene. Topham's "What is Truth?" (716), is worth looking at for the study of Pilate's face; and for contrast, Dendy Sadler's "Time" (675).

Of the portraits none can compare in genuine interest with one of the most unassuming pictures in the exhibition, "Major-General Baden-Powell," by G. F. Watts, in the frame of which is set a scrap of writing :—

> ". . . all may have
> If they dare try,
> A generous life or grave."

Among the sculpture the work of most general interest will doubtless be Brock's fine statue, in white marble, of Gladstone (1609), which is to be placed in Westminster Abbey. There is also a recumbent statue, in white marble, of the late Bishop of Wakefield, Dr. W. Walsham How (1718), for Wakefield Cathedral, and a model in silver of Hamo Thornycroft's "King Alfred Memorial at Winchester" (1684), presented to the Mayor, Alderman Bowker, who did so much to promote the recent celebration. Mr. H. R. Hope-Pinker's contribution this year is a fine bust of Dr. Warre, Head Master of Eton (1669).

IN the decision of momentous questions, rectitude of heart is a far surer guarantee of wisdom than power of intellect. When the unselfish purpose is ready to obey, the supernatural illumination is never wanting. When we desire only to do what is right, it is never long before we hear the voice behind us saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it," however much we might be otherwise inclined to turn aside to the right hand or to the left.—*F. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Donald's Birthday.

IT was Donald's birthday, and also that of a favourite school-friend of his. These two celebrated their birthdays alternately at each other's houses, and this had been Donald's turn to spend the evening with his friend. It was getting near the time for his return home, when the Hall Clock began the following conversation :—

"Master Donald will be coming back from his birthday party very soon; suppose we give him a reception of some kind when he returns. Will you join, Dining-room Clock?"

"Tell him," whispered the Dining-room Clock to Mrs. Flower in the window near him, "that I'm afraid I shall have no voice by the time Master Donald comes home, for I was not wound up this morning; otherwise I would join willingly." Mrs. Flower gave her message.

"As for me," she added, "I do not feel inclined to do anything for him. He never gave me any water this morning, and I'm nearly dried up. He was a very careless boy to-day, and does not deserve any reception." Mrs. Flower was very thirsty and rather cross.

"I have been in many houses," replied the Hall Clock, "and have seen much wrong done and the suffering of those who did it; I have seen much good done, and the happiness of those who did it. I believe there is no greater suffering than of those who do wrong; and nothing comforts, and helps them to do better, as much as love and patience. So my advice to you, Mrs. Flower, is to look as nice and smell as sweet as you can, and I think you will find it answer. If not, you will have done your best, and that is all you can do. I am sorry you were forgotten, too, Dining-room Clock, and it was Master Donald's special wish to take care of you while his sister was away—Hark! they are coming."

The hall door opened, and Donald and his parents came in. The Hall Clock struck ten as heartily as it could; Mrs. Flower gave as sweet a scent as she could, but she was so drooping she could not look very nice. The Dining-room Clock listened in silence, and joined in thought. Its voice had quite gone.

Donald went into the dining-room, and, after relieving himself of the various gifts he had brought back with him, turned to the flower.

"Oh, mother!" he cried, "my flower is nearly dead. I forgot to water it this morning. Poor flower! I'm so sorry. Please get better. I'll get some water at once," and he hurried away. While he was gone, his father and mother came up to the mantelpiece, and looked at the clock.

"This clock has stopped," said the father; "I'm afraid Donald must have forgotten this as well as the flower. That won't do."

"The flower has given him a lesson," answered the mother; "let us wind this up to-night, or his holiday will be spoilt if he finds everything gone wrong through his carelessness. It does not really matter."

So the clock was wound up, and ticked its approval, as soon as it recovered its voice. Mrs. Flower was well watered, and got better as quickly as possible. Donald and his parents went to bed, and the house was silent, except for the clocks.

"Well," ticked the Hall Clock, "our reception has been pretty successful, I think. Are you not glad you took my advice, Mrs. Flower?"

"Yes," replied Mrs. Flower, "but I don't think my scent was noticed."

"Perhaps not; but Master Donald was sorry for his neglect, and will be very careful for the future. Will you all join me in wishing him a good night and a happy year?" They all did.

MINISTER AND CHURCH COMMITTEE.

Dear Sir,—We have in our church serious differences in regard to the respective rights and functions of committee and minister, and I have thought that you, or some of your readers, might be willing to instruct and advise us.

We know that each congregation has power to decide upon its own methods; but our wish is to know what is our denominational usage and what is best?

I, the minister, have studiously sought to avoid all squabbling and strife, and to that end have surrendered as much as I can, consistently with the dignity of my office and the good of the cause; but I am now getting anxious, as I find serious consequences are following the encroachments of the committee and the limitation of the minister's power.

SUCH is the beginning of a tale of woe, which has reached us. Whether our correspondent has been wise in his efforts to avoid "squabbling," it is not for us to judge; but we are reminded of a sermon of the Rev. Philip Wicksteed's preached more than twenty years ago, on "Going Through and Getting Over," in which the distinction was very clearly drawn between troubles which must be bravely and patiently lived through, and those which have simply to be got over. To the latter belong those frictions of temper and misunderstanding which must be got over by having greater things to care about. Our impression is that to get over the greater part of the trouble indicated in our correspondent's letter what is needed is simply that the life of the congregation should be lifted to a higher religious level, in which no thought of "squabbling" could possibly arise.

In this congregation, we are told, it is allowed by the committee that the ministers shall conduct the Sunday services and visit, but there his functions seem to end, and he is allowed no supervision of any of the institutions connected with the church. In particular, he has no control of the programmes of the fortnightly socials, and cannot check the introduction of undesirable elements, and the same is true of the young people's dramatic society. Neither has he any control over the music introduced into the services, and if he wishes to hold any class or deliver any lecture, "he is expected to submit such projects to the opinion and decision of the committee." "The minister is not a member of the committee, and knows no more of what they are doing at any time than any ordinary member of the church. Their policy is to ignore him as much as possible and to treat him as subject to their orders."

And in conclusion our correspondent asks, on the following points, What is the usage of our churches?

1. Is it usual and desirable that the minister be a member of the committee?
2. If he is not a member, is he supposed to be subject to the directions of that committee?
3. Is the committee supposed to initiate every movement, or the minister?
4. If the minister is supposed to do this, where is his opportunity? How can he set in motion his plans?
5. What rights are usually allowed the minister in regard to the various departments of the church work?
6. Is he usually allowed and expected to exercise a supervision of all, and, if so, what is implied in this?

Now, as to these questions, we cannot undertake to say what is the usage of our churches, for there is no uniformity of practice; and if we were to attempt a discussion of the central question, "Ought a minister to be a member of his church committee?" we should doubtless find that we were treading on the edge of a volcano. It is true, indeed, that in other religious connections, under varieties of form, the minister, as a matter of course, is not merely a member, but is ex officio the chairman of his church committee (by whatever name it may be called); but with us there appears to be a wide-spread feeling that the minister ought not to be concerned with the business of a congregation.

Leaving that special point, however, and apart from any question of usage, good or bad, in our churches, there appears to us one general answer which ought to be given to our correspondent's questions.

In a healthy church there must be unity of religious life, and whatever is done in the congregation, whether in the conduct of public worship, in the ordering of its business affairs, or in any form of social activity, must make towards the strengthening of that common life, and giving it fit expression. Thus minister and executive officers and committee must work together, in hearty accord, or there is some radical defect in the church's life. In view of this fundamental principle, it may seem of little moment whether the minister is technically a member of the committee or not. All good work of the church must be done in common, in the one true spirit, the minister, of course, taking his own distinctive share, and other executive officers theirs, and sometimes he and sometimes other members of the congregation making suggestions or taking the initiative in new work. In a true brotherhood no awkward question of precedence can come in as a spoiler of peace or hinderer of work. If the question ever arises, Which shall be master—minister or committee? it is a lamentable token that one or both have forgotten the true principle of their union, and the meaning of religious life in the church. And if no better spirit can be brought in to master both, it may be taken as an evident sign that their connection ought to cease.

"SHE thought to herself," writes a modern novelist, "how delightful it would be to live in a house where everybody understood, and loved, and thought about every one else." She did not know that her wish was just for the kingdom of heaven.—F. W. Farrar.

THE VOLUNTARY SCHOOLS ENDOWMENT BILL.

ON the order for the second reading of the Government's Education Bill, with which Parliament had to deal on Monday, its rejection was moved by Mr. BRYCE. It was, he said, the most reactionary of the present Government's Education Bills, and was an absolute concession to clerical claims. There are many earnest friends of education, and staunch Liberals, who hold that the County and Borough Councils will furnish the best education authority, and have been on that account inclined to look with hope to this Bill as promising at least the beginning of a properly co-ordinated system of national education. A fortnight ago Mr. EDWIN ELLIS, while acknowledging that the Bill contained much that was most objectionable and retrogressive, urged in these columns that a serious attempt ought to be made so to amend it as to secure through its means some genuine step of progress. But Mr. BRYCE held that the faults of the Bill were too numerous and too deeply-embedded in its structure, the most objectionable features were precisely those to which the Government attached the greatest importance, and that therefore, despairing of amendment, he was compelled to move its rejection. He then proceeded to subject the Bill to a trenchant criticism, the chief points of which will also be found concisely and forcibly stated in his article on the Bill in this month's Nineteenth Century. With this should be read also Mr. LYULPH STANLEY'S more elaborate and no less searching criticism in the Contemporary Review.

Mr. BRYCE'S attack was directed against the three main grounds on which the Bill had been recommended to the House by Mr. BALFOUR. The first was the promise of "one authority." On this there were serious considerations, which might lead to a doubt whether after all the County authority, which clearly furnished the best area for secondary education, would prove to be best for elementary education, in which for effective management the area must not be unwieldy. And Mr. BRYCE showed how as a matter of fact the Bill did not secure the unity promised, since in small boroughs of over 10,000 and suburban districts of over 20,000 the authority would be divided. He further pointed out that the Bill weakened the central control of Whitehall and its power to stimulate the efforts of backward districts, while the County and Borough Councils, which were the rating authorities, were to pass on their executive authority to the Education Committee, which would have no control of finance, and their hold on local managers, particularly in the case of voluntary schools, was still further attenuated. Thus the scheme appeared to him "replete with confusion, fertile of jarring claims and interminable controversies."

The second claim for the Bill was that it would secure educational improvement, but there was every prospect, on the contrary, that it would lead to a depression of the standard. Mr. BALFOUR had insisted on the need of better training of teachers, but the Bill made no provision for this, and did nothing to remove the disabilities of Nonconformists in the matter of training colleges, and in connection with 8,000 Church schools, the only schools of their parish, which were now to be supported by public funds. Nor was any adequate provision made for secondary education, as to which the permissive clause was fatal. In the counties, where there was the greatest need of progress, it was least likely to be made.

The removal of the education authority from direct popular control, Mr. BRYCE held to be one of the most serious dangers of the Bill. As to this we cannot do better than quote the following passage from his Nineteenth Century article :—

> Of all the causes which have kept education in England, secondary as well as elementary, below the level it has reached in such countries as Switzerland and Scotland and New England, the most deep-seated is the want of popular interest and popular sympathy. The people have not felt the schools to be their own, have not been associated with the management, have not realised how largely the welfare and prosperity of the nation depend on the instructions which each generation receives. Since 1870 something has been done to stimulate popular interest by the creation of School Boards (whose admirable work in the large towns is admitted even by the Ministry which proposes to destroy them), by the introduction of a large representative element upon the governing bodies of endowed secondary schools, and by entrusting County and Borough Councils with power to spend money on technical instruction. What can be plainer than that a wise statesmanship ought to follow in the same path, endeavouring to create everywhere local educational authorities chosen by the people and responsible to the people, keeping these local authorities up to the mark of making a share in the Imperial grant conditional upon full efficiency, but teaching them to look upon the schools as their own and to feel that it is their own interest as parents and citizens to make their schools worthy of an advancing nation? No such idea has been present to those who framed this Bill. It reduces, instead of increasing, the element of popular interest and popular control.

To enforce the value of such direct popular interest, Mr. BRYCE quotes the following significant passage from the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commission of 1868, which included the present Archbishop of CANTERBURY and the late Bishop of WINCHESTER :—

> No skill in organisation, no careful adaptation of the means in hand to the best ends, can do as much for education as the earnest co-operation of the people. The American schools appear to have no great excellence of method. But the schools are in the hands of the people, and from this fact they derive a force which seems to make up for all their deficiencies. . . . In Zürich the schools are absolutely in the hands of the people, and the complete success of the system must be largely ascribed to this cause. . . . It is impossible to doubt that in England also inferior management, if it were backed up by very hearty sympathy from the mass of the people, would often succeed better than much greater skill without such support.

This, which was said of secondary education, applies with even greater force to elementary; but the Bill works directly against that principle, and in the case of the denominational schools it gives a large measure of public support without any adequate popular control. It aims, in fact, at the permanent establishment and endowment of sectarian schools, which is directly contrary to the best interests of national education. Thus Mr. BRYCE, in his speech, described the general effect of the Bill :—

> This Parliament may conceivably pass this Bill, but the sober judgment of the country will not acquiesce in it. Sober judgment has already condemned it. The only bodies that have not opposed the Bill are ecclesiastical organisations. How can a system be final which excludes Nonconformist teachers from more than half the schools in the country? How can a system get rid of barren controversy which multiplies fourfold the occasions on which sectarian controversies can arise? Hitherto we have had no such controversy in the elections of County and Borough Councils. Henceforth we shall have them. It will be renewed in these councils when they come to appoint an education committee, and in this committee when it comes to appoint a school manager, and in the localities whenever they have to consider the question of creating an extra school to meet denominational requirements. How can a system be final which leaves two sets of elementary schools, without any power to discontinue schools which are unnecessary, or to co-ordinate the working of those schools, and with different sets of managers, one set capable of being dismissed, the other irremovable, because entrenched behind the rampart of sectarian privilege?

But even if there were no religious grievance Mr. BRYCE insisted that the Bill would be a violation of the principle that rate aid can only be given where there is genuine local control. And he concluded:—

The Government have had a great opportunity. They might have improved secondary education, they might have given better areas for elementary education, and they might have secured the stimulus of local interest and sympathy. They have done none of those things. Their scheme is a confused patch—a mass of cumbrous, complicated machinery without unity of system or real effective motive power. We are told that the strain of commercial competition is becoming more severe, and that we need far more efficient training for our boys and girls in order to enable England to hold her ground against the solid and laborious German and the keen and eager American. But I venture to put the case on higher grounds. What greater interest can a country have than that the teaching throughout all her schools, from top to bottom, should be such as to open to talent the opportunity to rise, and in rising to benefit the whole community, and to turn to the utmost all those natural resources with which our people, not less than other people, are gifted? Sir, it is these great interests, interests upon which the strength and welfare of an Imperial people depend, which makes education a matter of supreme concern; and it is because this measure is framed in a narrow spirit, and, regardless of those interests, holds out no hope of their promotion, and because it fails to provide what England asks and needs, that I move the rejection of this Bill.

The second reading of the Bill will no doubt be passed by a large majority on Thursday after these lines are in type; and if they choose to do so, the Government with their majority can force the measure unamended through Committee; but they cannot command the future, and the people of England will not long tolerate the subjection of their schools to clerical control. The wave of reaction will before long have spent its force; a more enlightened spirit will prevail, a broader and loftier conception of religion, and the way will be opened for a just and effective and truly national system of education.

THE AKUREYRI DISASTER.

IT will be remembered that on receiving news through the Rev. M. Jochumsson of a disastrous fire at Akureyri, on the northern coast of Iceland, on Dec. 19, we opened a Relief Fund at the suggestion of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who had been in Iceland in the previous summer. The response to our appeal was generous, and when the fund was closed, in time for the next mail on March 4, it amounted to £123 3s. We have now received the following letter of acknowledgment from Mr. Jochumsson, which for the sake of the many friends who contributed to the fund, it seems best to print exactly as it is written. In explanation, it should be added that our letter, which went by the mail of March 4 contained a bank-draft for £100, the balance of £23 3s., being at the same time forwarded in Post-office Orders, and that we sent a second letter for greater security by a later mail on March 7, telling of the former despatch. We must hope that by this time our first letter has reached Akureyri, but we do not understand why the Post-office Orders should have been forwarded overland, and the letter by sea. From Akureyri to London Mr. Jochumsson's letter came in twenty days:—

Akureyri, Iceland,
April 12, 1902.

Dear Sir,—Your precious and unexpected letter from March 5, arrived overland from Reykjavik on the 2nd inst., together with the Post-office Order for £23 3s., and telling me of the former letter of yours sent with the s.s. Vesta and containing a draft for £100. As Vesta is still hindered by the ice from coming round—three-fourths of our coastline being shut out from the world—I hasten to return my answer overland vid Reykjavik.

But how to adequately express our feeling of gratitude? I beg simply to say: God bless your splendid donation; God bless you all for this most timely, most beautiful token of Unitarian love and liberality.

To help me to settle the question of distributing the money I directly had a committee appointed among the best men of our township, and I trust that we have succeeded in our management so far as to make all our poorer sufferers from the fire not only very substantially helped, but as happy and contented as their noble givers wish them to be. A vote of public thanks and acknowledgment to the donors was unanimously adopted, and will be printed and forwarded at the reception of the draft.

This great and generous help of yours came to our poor community quite as a new little gospel from far and unseen friends; the more delightful as it was thoroughly unexpected, and brought help, hope and comfort to our needy sufferers in the middle of one of the severest winters on record.

With my most hearty regards to all my good and noble friends of your community, I remain,

Most brotherly yours,
MATTH. JOCHUMSSON.

RELIGION V. THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

SIR,—Few readers of THE INQUIRER will fail to be impressed by the "challenge" to which Miss Frances Power Cobbe has given such forcible utterance in your last issue, and few will dissent from her statement of the problem which lies before humanity now—"How to satisfy the spiritual and moral needs of man without either an infallible book or an infallible Church." But what are "the only bases left" for "the building up afresh of theology and ethics"? There are some of us who think that the whole trend of present-day philosophical thought is towards a conclusion which negatives the answer suggested by Miss Cobbe.

The answer to this great question, in our view, depends on the two fundamental truths that it is impossible even in thought to separate God and man, and that the whole evolutionary process of the world is to be regarded as a God-process, the Divine reaching its highest manifestation in the mind and heart of the most perfect man.

Those who believe that these positions have a sound foundation in reason and experience cannot fail to recognise the consequences that flow from them. To separate Religion from its history is impossible. While a belief of long standing may not be wholly true, yet, in that it is of long standing, it cannot be wholly false. If we search deeply, we shall find a reason that justifies it, or at least some element of it. It cannot possess all the truth—it may not possess even an important truth—yet it has a fragment worth searching for and preserving. Hence, if we simply deny the various doctrines which orthodoxy has regarded as fundamental, we are leaving Truth behind us and "advancing" to nothing.

Our difference with orthodoxy is, or ought to be, that we try to break down the irrational limitations and qualifications by which orthodoxy conceals the real meaning of the truths which most of its dogmas embody. We need to universalise the truths which, even in the imperfect forms in which it holds them, give to orthodoxy its strength and power over the human heart. And the task of universalising them has already been taken up by liberal thought within orthodoxy itself. Ought we not to welcome this, and carry it forward with energy and enthusiasm? Half a century ago, when orthodoxy was bound in cast-iron dogmas, and was, in fact, a spiritually cramping system of superstition, Unitarians led the way, and were the pioneers of liberal thought. The conditions have changed. Will Unitarians lead the way in building up a truly Catholic Christianity for the coming century? Or will they be left behind, stranded and dying, on a desert shore of their own making?

OLIVER HEYWOOD.

THE Bicentenary of the death of Oliver Heywood on May 4, 1702, recalled the memory of one of the staunchest of the old Nonconformists in the first days of persecution. He was a young man of thirty-two in the fateful year of the Act of Uniformity, and for forty years after was devoted, with an utter disregard of consequences, to a faithful ministry. Of Heywood and his contemporaries, Mr. Tayler says in his Retrospect of the Religious Life of England:—

"The men of this period form the transition class between the old Puritan of the time of the wars, and the Protestant Dissenter recognised by the Toleration Act of the Revolution. With them we are immediately connected through the foundation of our religious societies, and the possession at this day of many principles and tendencies which they have transmitted to us. The memory of our great-grandfathers reaches back to the time when their personal influence was strong and active in the world. They are our spiritual ancestors—the fathers of English Protestant Dissent. This was the period that witnessed the painful ministry, the prolific tongue and pen, the severe and saint-like virtue, sweetened with a holy meekness, of Baxter, Owen, Bates, and Howe in the metropolis; of Heywood, Fairfax, Newcome, Henry and Flavel in the provinces. Such men, like true prophets of God, lived heroically on their convictions; and amidst the disquietudes of a troubled and persecuted life, with the Court, the priesthood, and the magistracy leagued against them, giving themselves up to the single inspiration of faith and duty, strove earnestly to fulfil the solemn vow they had laid on their souls, that they would preach at whatever cost the truths of eternal life to sinful and dying men."

The Bicentenary of Oliver Heywood's death fell on Sunday, and the Rev. Charles Hargrove preached in Mill Hill Chapel a sermon, now published as the May number of the Mill Hill Pulpit,* "Oliver Heywood: Preacher and Sometime Prisoner." The text is Acts iv. 19, 20, the answer of men faithful to conscience, as an authority higher than any earthly tribunal. From this point the sermon proceeds:—

"Of such was Oliver Heywood, who died this fourth day of May, two hundred years ago. He was not a man distinguished, even among his colleagues of the Nonconformist ministry, for learning or eloquence above others. Of himself he writes:—'In the interpretation of prophecy I am nowhere; in dogmatic theology I am a mere scholar; in controversy I am ever loth to engage; but in practical religion I am a willing worker, though now bowed down with age.' It is as the most willing and most energetic of all the founders of Yorkshire Nonconformity that he is remembered to-day throughout the West Riding, and more especially in the neighbourhoods of Halifax, Bradford, and Wakefield, where most he laboured. He kept a list of his journeyings and various services, from which we find that, besides his regular Sunday duties, from which he never gave himself a holiday, he preached 1,500 times in the course of thirty-five years' ministry, assisted at long days of fasting or thanksgiving some twenty to thirty times a year, and journeyed to and fro on horseback over 16,000 miles. One year's rest he had from otherwise ceaseless travel: it was the year 1685, when he lay prisoner at York from January 26th to December 19th. So far as I know it was the only vacation of his long life, the only one at least of which I have come across a notice in his voluminous diary.

"He was much more than a learned divine, of whom there were many among the Puritan ministers of his time; he was an apostle, a founder of churches; in faith and zeal an eminent type of the brave and pious Nonconformists to whom we of Mill Hill owe our existence. He preached in the old chapel here on several occasions, and once was put into the town jail. He writes how, one Tuesday in February of 1675, he set off from his home at Halifax 'to preach at the new meeting-place at Leeds on the morrow,' and as he rode along, 'I pleased myself,' he says, 'in imagining what an auditory I should have' (for the church was even then 'the most considerable in these parts'); 'I thought what content I should give to good people, how seasonable the text and subject would be—then checkt and challenged myself for these proud conceits, told the Lord how just he should be if he should prevent my preaching, and endeavoured to work my heart to content if so it should happen.' At Morley he met a friend who showed the king's order for recalling licenses and suppressing meetings, so when he came to Leeds he had to be content to preach at the minister's house that night instead of at the chapel."

Mr. Hargrove then shows that while there was in Heywood nothing of modern liberal thinking, they could yet look to him as standing for great principles, on which their own religious life was founded, fidelity to truth and conscience, while they had inherited their old chapels, in several of which Heywood had preached, open for the natural progress of religious thought. And the sermon concluded as follows:—

"But if we have left the past far behind, we never have disowned it and never shall. In the matter of doctrine we have as little sympathy with Oliver Heywood and his brethren as they could have had with us. But we honour him and the others, our founders, for the noble stand they made for free speech and the rights of conscience; we revere his devoted life, given from earliest years to whatever he discerned to be God's service; we are proud to know ourselves beholden to such as he was for this place, where we meet, in the midst of this great City, to worship God our own way, finding fault with none for that they 'follow not with us.' We are ashamed of this only, that in earnestness, in courage, in faith, we are so far behind these men, who in very deed 'counted all things loss for Christ' and truth and the salvation of men, who were so far behind us in the knowledge which puffeth up, so far in advance of us in the love which edifieth."

A leading article in Tuesday's Daily News, written from a strongly "Independent" point of view, dealt in an interesting manner with the Heywood Bicentenary, and gave a glowing picture of what might have happened if the Presbyterians and Independents could have held together in the maintenance of the nation's liberties. But we fancy that those old "Presbyterians" would have had more to say for themselves than the writer seems inclined to allow. Heywood was, no doubt, a contemporary of Baxter's, but he was a younger man by fifteen years.

At Westgate Chapel, Wakefield, the Bicentenary was celebrated on Sunday with every mark of respect, and in a most impressive manner. It had been felt that Wakefield ought to take a leading part in the commemoration of this grand old Puritan preacher, since he was the mainstay of the congregation for more than a quarter of a century, and it gladdened his heart to open the first meeting-house in Fanshaw-lane in 1672, and to inaugurate the more permanent place of worship, nearer the centre of the town, on August 29, 1697. Besides, when the memorable Wakefield Assembly was held in 1691 for the purpose of promoting union between the Presbyterians and Independents, a strong and influential body of his supporters used every effort to secure the hearty co-operation of both bodies, but unfortunately with only partial success. On this occasion Heywood preached and pleaded for the broader view, but his overtures were rejected by the Independents.

The Rev. Andrew Chalmers had been extremely anxious that the commemoration should be worthy of so noble a personality, and during the last three months he has given his congregation the fullest information regarding Oliver Heywood's character and career. A public lecture on "Wakefield during the Reign of Charles II." was given in full, in six weekly instalments, in one of the local newspapers, so that the public has been able to enter enthusiastically into the celebration.

Sunday, being the exact date of the Bicentenary, gave an additional appropriateness to the proceedings. Mr. Chalmers had prepared a pleasant surprise for the congregation by having a large portrait of Oliver Heywood, framed in carved oak, placed in the communion enclosure, and this was an object of much interest during the memorial services. In the morning Mr. Chalmers preached from Zechariah i. 5:—"Your fathers, where are they, and the prophets, do they live for ever?" and strongly emphasised the need for continuance in reforming work.

In the afternoon a service was held for the Sunday scholars and young people, and it was gratifying to notice the deep interest shown in the thrilling story of Heywood's life and death. The evening service was, however, the culminating point of the commemoration. This was for the most part musical, and with a largely augmented choir, and a carefully arranged selection from several oratorios, the essential spirit of the old Puritan struggle found a pathetic expression. Mr. Chalmers' address harmonised with the prevailing sentiment of gratitude for the privileges won by faithful men in those perilous times, and the large assemblage was evidently touched by the graphic picture of the days of persecution. So far as Wakefield is concerned the memory of Oliver Heywood has been fittingly commemorated, and the clearer understanding of the cause he maintained has had recognition, the effect of which will not be speedily effaced.

"RELIGIOUS LIBERALISM IN MODERN ENGLISH PAINTING."

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

IT is pleasant for a minister in the company of the laity to bear witness to the work that has been done for Liberal religion by men and women whose special aim has not been theological. Comparison among those who are competing in a great purpose is especially odious, and I will not stop to discuss whether the poets and painters have done as much or more than the divines to forward religious liberalism. I am content to remind you that laymen like Wordsworth and Holman Hunt have spread a broad religious influence among people who would not listen to Maurice, or Dean Stanley, or Dr. Martineau, and have, moreover, clothed liberal ideas with a beauty and persuasion beyond the power of the preacher.

Now the influence of the poet in shaping the faith of the age is obvious to most educated minds. Burns, for example, threw scorn upon the narrow doctrine and Pharisaism of the Scottish Kirk, and Byron poured contempt on the God of English Calvinism. Wordsworth drove away, as the sun scatters the mist, the dry mechanical theories of God and the universe which had been in vogue for more than a hundred years. While Tennyson and Browning have given faith in God's Fatherhood and a Life to come to thousands for whom the old creeds had ceased to be true.

But until lately the influence of the painter has been less general, and therefore less manifest. Pictures have, to a large extent, been buried in private houses. Engravings are not, as books are, reproductions of the original. They are mere shadows of paintings. Nor, on account of their cost, have they reached the multitude. But of recent years the printer has come to the aid of the people, and given them in black and white, and even in colour, cheap rough impressions of the painter's work. No doubt, from the point of view of the student of art, this is by no means always gain. Far from it. But the fact remains that through the printer the artist may speak, if in sadly diminished tones, to the masses of the nation.

And his work is making itself felt. In landscape, in studies of child-life and home-life generally, and in directly religious subjects English painting is doing a good deal to undermine the old and narrow theology, and is the more potent because, with that subtle and gentle influence which art possesses, it incites no antagonism. The true painter does not descend, any more than the true poet, or, for that matter, the true preacher, to controversy. He never waves a sectarian banner. An Old Catholic liberal such as Giotto carves his conception of the story of human progress, in Biblical characters for the most part, but with quiet omission of all reference to the Fall, or a broad orthodox Protestant like Holman Hunt paints Jesus among the doctors as youth and love and truth in contact with the hardness of the old thought and the feeble semi-liberalism and indifference of the new, and teaches a lesson at least as good as that which the most enlightened controversialist would fain give, while he hurts nobody's feelings and stirs up no antipathies.

A hundred and fifty years ago we had no landscape. Educated persons did not care for Nature. Nature had no place among Christian evidences. The eighteenth-century theologians, in their wigs and black gowns, were concerned with schemes of atonement, design arguments, and what have been called the "carpenter" theories of creation. The glory of mountains and skies is absent from their theology, as from the poetry of the time, or hidden under pompous phraseology. There is no landscape in Hogarth. If ever we get a glimpse of the sea, or of the hills round London, it is mere incident and background to human folly. And when, as in Gainsborough, genuine landscape appears—that is, Nature for her own sake—it is all dark, like the scenery of Gray's "Elegy in a Country Churchyard," among evening shadows and the owls. To get away from "the madding crowd's ignoble strife," the painter went with the poet into the woods and the twilight. The mystery of darkness haunted the fancy of our painters, as of our writers and preachers, of that age. Constable also, who made a drawing of Stoke Pogis churchyard, clings to the shadows, or shut himself in, as in his finest picture, under heavy rain-clouds. The first to go really out into the open, into the sunshine, and to show us the height and breadth and depth of Nature, was Turner—who, however, had to emerge, with his time, from the darkness. His early pictures, like the "Calais Pier," are very black; then he paints the sun rising through the mist; and at last he gives us the sun itself in the majesty of its rising and setting. In the "Polyphemus" and the "Old Temeraire," which make such a grand pair of sun-pictures, he endeavours to represent the infinite aspects of the sky. He was Pantheistic, as Wordsworth was, but not a little pagan too, and akin somewhat to Byron in his view of human nature. His God was in the sun, in the Alpine snows and vapours, and the raging sea; not in man's heart. In Turner's work man is pathetic or evil, the sort of Drury-lane or Wapping Stairs humanity he had known from his childhood, with a very considerable dash of original sin in his composition and a great deal of misery in his fate. His finest pictures are sad. In the "Old Temeraire" the sun goes down as the stately old warship, type of the venerable past, is drawn to her grave by the fussy, noisy little steamer which anticipates our modern mechanical and cock-sure time. Look at a sketch made by him "in his last years," "Dawn after a Shipwreck." The sunrise breaks blood-red through the storm-clouds, and lightens up the level wet sand and the foam of the sea angrily sinking to rest. A vessel has gone down in the night, and all that remains is the dog, which, "utterly exhausted, its limbs failing under it and sinking into the sand," howls and shivers in misery.

Since Turner, however, though Nature has never been represented with anything like the grandeur and truth he revealed, man has won his rightful place in landscape as the loved child and not the victim of Nature. Glance, for example, at this drawing of Evesham, by De Wint, with the church and houses nestling among the trees and the ploughman busy at his work; or at Creswick's "Pathway to Church"; or Linnell's "Noonday Rest," a group of harvesters taking a nap under the sheaves of corn; or Vicat Cole's "Pool of London," a picture which proves what poetry may still be felt at London Bridge.

A similar change towards brighter and kinder views may be traced in domestic painting since Hogarth. Husbands and wives and children are not attractive in Hogarth's works. They are not always attractive now, but we may be thankful that we do not live in the days of the "Marriage à la Mode." If we allow for the usual exaggeration of the moralist, we may find abundant ground in the home-life of Hogarth's satire for eighteenth-century Calvinism. He was no Methodist, as we may see in his caricature of the godly steward with a book on "Regeneration" in his pocket; but we could not have better evidence of the need of regeneration in his time than the fallen and degraded London-life he so frequently depicted. Look at one of his pleasanter subjects—the congregation coming out of the Huguenot meeting-house in St. Giles's. A fashionable French couple—he with a pinch of snuff between his finger and thumb, and walking elegantly on his toes like a dancing-master, she gesticulating with her fan — are bandying compliments at the very door of the conventicle, while her boy, dressed up like a little old man, with wig and walking-stick, enjoys the sight of a dead cat in the gutter. In contrast to this light-headed group are the godly and vinegary faces of the man and wife behind, and of the old cronies kissing one another piously on the right. At the opposite side are non-churchgoers, a wrangling woman throwing her husband's dinner out of a window, a girl with a pie, suffering the embraces of a coarse negro, and a shock-headed boy yelling at the top of his voice, having broken his dish against a post and dropped the contents, which a poor girl devours greedily. Now go lower in the social scale, and see the young ruffians in the corner of one of the scenes of the "Rake's Progress." One boy, stript to the waist, shows the prison-brand on his body; another, ready for prison, signals to a comrade the card in his opponent's hand; a third, behind the rest, picks the pocket of the swell stepping out of his chair.

But Hogarth's own satire was part of an effort towards better things. One of our Presbyterian forefathers, Dr. Daniel Williams—the founder of Dr. Williams's Library in London—caused to be published on his death in 1716, when Hogarth was a young man, a little book entitled "The Vanity of Childhood and Youth, wherein the depraved Nature of young people is represented, and means for their reformation proposed," with a Catechism, in which to the question, "What if thou shouldst die in that condition wherein thou wert born by nature?" the child is made to answer "I should be undone, and be with the devils in Hell for ever." Hogarth's work was in the direction of Dr. Williams's, and somewhat in his spirit. The Wesleyan movement went deeper. It appealed to something divine in human nature, as the source of reformation. A new philanthropy followed Methodism. Captain Coram founded the Foundling Hospital; John Howard worked in the prisons; John Pounds started the Sunday-schools; Hannah More and Elizabeth Fry brought woman's influence to bear on social evils. A marked improvement came over the morals and manners of England during the second half of the century, and showed itself in painting. Compare, for instance, Hogarth's portrait of Captain Coram with Gainsborough's "Parish Clerk," or Hogarth's "Lavinia Fenton," the popular actress in Gay's "Beggar's Opera," with Gainsborough's "Mrs. Siddons." Even more significant are the children in Reynolds's pictures. Look at his "Child Samuel," of which Hannah More wrote enthusiastically to her sister in 1776, telling her, by-the-bye, how mortified Reynolds had been at some great people asking him who Samuel was; or at the "Age of Innocence," painted a few years later; or, best of all, at the "Angel Heads," a series of five portraits in different positions of the face of the little daughter of Lord William Gordon. Such work proves, I think, the new refinement and tendencies that had entered not only into English art but into the homes of wealthy Englishmen. Among the poor the change was necessarily slower but it was unmistakable. Good Thomas Bewick, who had been himself a mischievous Tyneside boy, with a love of animals before Burns and of mountains before Wordsworth, gives us, in his amusing tail-pieces, a picture of the rough youth of his neighbourhood, which, however unattractive, compares very favourably with Hogarth's representation. The same may be said of Morland's dirty little brats in the tavern doors, and of the boys in Turner's landscapes, who look, most of them, as if they had been born and bred in the forecastle. Next comes a group of painters who were contemporaries of Wordsworth, and whose art might be said, in certain directions, to illustrate his poetry. They painted such children as we read of in "The Lyrical Ballads" and the "Prelude"—village children, in the lanes or at school, brought up amid the sights and sounds of the country, "fostered alike by beauty and by fear." I think Ruskin was too severe on Wilkie when he said that his children were commonplace. The criticism, at any rate, cannot be made of Mulready. See, for instance, the taller girl on the right in "Last In," who pities the lazy boy under his master's sarcastic rebuke. She might be Alice Fell or Lucy Gray. Even more Wordsworthian, because full of joy, are Collins's youngsters, as in "Happy as a King." The harsh theories of infant corruption and baptism and everlasting punishment received a heavy blow from such a picture as this. Then, after the Wordsworthians, we have the Pre-Raphaelites, contemporary with Dickens and Tennyson. Millais's domestic pictures were the outcome of the new social and religious sympathies that produced "Oliver Twist," "Enoch Arden," and "Sea Dreams." Distinctions of wealth and class are forgotten in the beauty of a common humanity. In "The Woodman's Daughter," a well-dressed little squire, in light shoes, offers his precious strawberries, in a rather lordly way, to a shy little peasant maiden in a poor frock and heavy boots. It is the meeting together of rich and poor, characteristic of the politics and literature, as well as the art of England, just prior to the Crimean War. "The Blind Girl" goes deeper. Two sisters, the elder of them blind, sit by the roadside on the edge of a common. A shower of rain has just passed over, and the summer sun shines out full on the fresh, wet grass. The blind girl holds up her face to the light, her senses quickened by the scent of the flowers, the cawing of the rooks, and the noise, which has alarmed her sister sheltering under her shawl, of the retreating thunder. So still they are, the elder pressing the younger to her with one hand and with the other feeling the shape of a harebell, that a butterfly rests quietly upon her shoulder and the rain-drops yet sparkle on her eyelids. The contrast between the brilliant landscape without and the darkness within is deeply pathetic; but the bow of God's promise, a double rainbow for her, is in the sky, and the crude music of the concertina on her lap foretells the music of angels which some day she will hear in Heaven. It does not matter that she is poor, or, if it be so, that she is unbaptised, or in any way a heretic; for she is God's child, and He will take care of her. In the same spirit Millais's early pictures of lovers, such as "The Huguenot" and "The Proscribed Royalist," break down the dividing walls of the creeds. There is a love and a worship which unites Catholic and Protestant, Anglican and Puritan.

Of domestic painting since the Pre-Raphaelites, I must not say more than to remind you of the influence of women in deepening our love for human nature and so preparing for a wider theology. Mrs. Allingham—who, as Helen Paterson, the daughter of Unitarian parents, was associated with Mrs. Ewing, a good Trinitarian, by her illustrations of "Jan of the Windmill"—painted the children of the Surrey villages; while Kate Greenaway brought the simple flowing dress, the unaffected beauty, the sweetness, naïveté, and freshness of country childhood into the homes of our cities.* Dorothy Tennant, on the other hand, has shown us the gaiety and poetry of the life of our street arabs, and sometimes, with great force, its pathos. Her touching picture, "His First Offence," and Miss Brickdale's "Happiness"—a tired workman on the tramp stretching to kiss his child in the mother's arms—are a far cry from the fierce and coarse malignity of Hogarth.

PROVIDENT BANK WORKERS.

SIR,—We venture to appeal to your readers for help to continue the good work now being done in connection with the Provident Bank at Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel. The lady visitors and other collectors are absolutely overworked, and, if we are to keep up our annual 26,000 or more visits in the neighbourhood, we must obtain strong reinforcements.

The work is not only that of helping the poor to put their money by against necessitous times, but is one of always enlarging sympathy and knowledge of the people in their homes.

The day for collecting is Monday, from 10 A.M. to 1 P.M., and we may add that Stamford-street is easy of access from all parts of London.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting of this Association was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, Belfast, on Monday evening, May 5. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. JOHN ROGERS, who was supported by the Revs. W. Napier, J. A. Kelly (hon. sec.), A. Ashworth, T. Dunkerley, W. J. Davies, R. J. Orr, W. Weatherall, W. G. Marsden, A. Davison, G. J. Slipper, T. B. Evans, and others.

The Committee's report stated that the work of the Association had been well maintained in the cause of Unitarian Christianity. The depository had been supplied with most of the latest publications of the B. and F.U.A. and S.S.A., and a special edition of Mr. Stopford Brooke's International Council sermon had been published. Subscribers were urged to co-operate by the purchase of books through the agent, and ministers were also urged to buy S.S. prizes through the same agency. A large number of tracts and pamphlets had been distributed in answer to inquirers, and the Postal Mission had been very busily at work; but this had been to some extent hindered through lack of funds. The report made sorrowful reference to the loss sustained through the death of Miss Benn, from whom a legacy of £200 had been received, and also to the loss of Messrs. R. Murray, W. Hay, and R. Herron, old supporters of the Association. The need of more funds was emphasised, and warm acknowledgment was made to Mr. W. M'Ninch, who was obliged, after fifteen years of service, to retire from the treasurership.

The financial statement showed a balance of £46 19s. 4d. in hand, a fact not calculated to encourage new subscribers.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that during the past year their funds had not warranted them in any ambitious flights. He observed that the balance was somewhat less than what it was at the end of last year. They were under a debt of gratitude to Mr. Kelly for his exertions in raising special funds. That Society existed principally for the sale of and procuring books bearing upon their Unitarian Christianity. He did not think anyone could take exception to the books sold in their repository. Another object of the Society was the distribution of tracts and pamphlets bearing upon their views. He thought it was very evident to all of them that they were not increasing in numbers. They were no more than what they were fifty or sixty years ago. If they inquired were the people who held their principles increasing, he thought they might say they were. They did not know the result of the distribution they made of books and pamphlets. He observed in a paper last week an account of a situation in the Scottish Presbyterian Church. It referred to the decision of the Greenock Established Presbytery to overture the General Assembly to draw up and append to the formula of subscription to the Confession of Faith a note expressive of the liberty which the Church was prepared to grant in the interpretation of the formula. There they had at the beginning of the twentieth century a movement beginning in Scotland which might have very far-reaching results. With regard to their funds, he thought their country friends were entitled to do something to help them a little in their work.

In conclusion, he expressed the pleasure with which they had heard of the appointment of the Rev. Alexander Gordon as Rawdon Fellow, in succession to the late Dr. Vance Smith, who, with Dr. Martineau, had been the first to hold the fellowship. Mr. Gordon now shared with Dr. Drummond, of Manchester College, Oxford, that honour which was a mark of distinguished scholarship.

The Rev. WILLIAM NAPIER, in seconding the motion, hoped the great principles they were endeavouring to set before the public would continue to prosper.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY, with regard to the Twentieth Century Fund, said the subscriptions were not quite up to what the committee expected, but they believed there were many who still intended subscribing to the fund.

The report having been adopted, a vote of thanks was passed to the Rev. T. B. Evans, who had preached the Association Sermons on the previous day, and a resolution moved by Mr. JAS. DAVIDSON, seconded by the Rev. T. DUNKERLEY, reaffirmed the principles and objects of the Association.

A vote of thanks to the Chairman and those who had variously contributed to the enjoyment of the evening brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Accrington.—The school sermons were preached on May 4 by the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, a native of Accrington. In the morning the sermon was based on the parable of "The Rich Man and Lazarus." In the afternoon a musical service was held in the school, the singing being accompanied by an orchestra of reeds, strings, and cornet. Special hymns were sung by the scholars, and the anthems "Forward be our Watchword" and "Thus saith the Lord" were rendered by the choir and scholars jointly. Mr. Mills gave an address in the afternoon, and preached again at night to a good congregation.

Blackpool (South Shore).—Anniversary services were conducted last Sunday by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes. There were good congregations, the congregational singing was particularly hearty, and special music was rendered by the choir. The collections amounted to £10 13s. 8d.

Burnley.—At a meeting of the Trafalgar-street congregation last Sunday evening, the following resolution was passed:—"That this meeting of the Unitarians of Burnley strongly protests against the Government's Education Bill, on the following, among other grounds: That it does not improve elementary education, nor secure its continuity with secondary, technical and higher education. That it aims at the destruction of School Boards, without putting any effective authority in their place, and bolsters up the denominational system by subsidising the sectarian schools out of the public purse, without providing any real public control. That the Bill will perpetuate the injustice Nonconformists already suffer with regard to the training and appointment of teachers; and is a heavy blow to that civil and religious freedom for which Unitarians, in common with other Nonconformists, have so strenuously laboured and so heroically suffered in the past." At the same meeting a resolution of warm sympathy with the Rev. T. Leyland, formerly minister of the congregation, was passed, expressing sorrow that failure of health had compelled him to resign for a time his pastoral work at Colne, and adding words of affectionate remembrance of his work at Burnley.

Chester.—The annual meeting of the congregation was held in the schoolroom of Matthew Henry's Chapel on Monday, May 5, at 8 P.M., the Rev. H. E. Haycock in the chair. The treasurer's statement of accounts for the year ending March, 1902, which had already been printed and circulated, was unanimously passed. The minister's report was received and adopted, and ordered to be printed and circulated. The members of the Vestry and the Social Union Committee, and the hon. secretary were re-elected for the ensuing year. On April 16 the Bachelors and Benedicts of the congregation held a most successful soirée, which realised £8 for the restoration fund. The collection taken last Sunday in aid of the capital sum required to start "The Ministers' Pension and Superannuation Fund" amounted to about £4 12s.

Cirencester.—A Spring Flower Service was held on Sunday last, when special sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Austin, and the flowers blended with the singing to make the service beautiful.

Darlington.—On Wednesday evening, April 23, the Rev. J. C. Street paid a visit to the Lead-yard Church, and delivered a lecture on "Many Ways to Heaven." A large audience was visibly impressed by the force and eloquence of the address. On Monday, the 28th, the members of the church assembled to take formal leave of Mrs. J. Marshall, on her removal to London. For some years Mrs. Marshall has taken an active interest in the work of the church, and has frequently taken the Sunday services. Mr. Cox Walker, on behalf of the members, presented Mrs. Marshall with a handsome sewing machine and a fountain pen. Mrs. Marshall, in responding to the many expressed good wishes and kindly sentiments of the friends present, regretted her departure and the necessary severance of an association which had been exceedingly pleasant, and she trusted mutually helpful. The Lead-yard would always have a tender place in her memory.

Dover.—On Sunday, May 4, the Adrian-street Church held their 259th anniversary. The Rev. S. Burrows preached in the morning on "The Unwalled City," advocating a creedless church with earnest religious convictions; and in the evening on "The Faith of our Fathers and the Thought of To-day," tracing the evolution of the Puritan faith into religious conceptions more in harmony with modern thought and science. On May 6 a congregational tea was held, followed by the annual meeting. Reports were read, and a favourable account of the year's work was given. At the conclusion of the meeting the Ladies' Sewing Circle presented the Dover Hospital with a parcel of underclothing, the result of their last session's work.

Ipswich.—Very successful Spring Flower Services were held on Sunday, May 4. The chapel was prettily decorated with flowers by members of the Ladies' Committee, and special music was prepared by the choir, including a hymn, "Flowers, lovely Flowers," written for the occasion by the choirmaster, Mr. Frank Woolnough, to whom much of the success of the services was due. The congregation, both morning and evening, was much larger than usual. The Rev. L. Tavener preached in the morning on "Leaves," and in the evening on "Flowers." At the close of the evening service a short organ recital was given by Mr. Maurice Cooke.

London: Deptford.—On Thursday week a large number of parents and friends of the Sunday-school scholars attended a social evening, given by the Rev. A. J. Marchant and the church. The Rev. T. E. M. Edwards also attended, together with the officers of the church. Several friends contributed by songs to the enjoyment of the evening.

London: Forest Gate.—An entertainment has been given by the young people, under the direction of Miss Tolmie and Miss Unett, consisting of a musical play, action songs, &c., which gave great pleasure to their friends. Unfortunately for the congregation Miss Tolmie is taking up an appointment in a Higher Grade School at Stockton, and at a special meeting her admirable services were recognised by a present of books from her Sunday scholars and fellow-members. Another entertainment, arranged by Mr. Ford and his circle, was given a few days later, and was much appreciated. The profits of these, nearly £6, were handed over to the Improvement Fund.

Middlesbrough.—The Spring Conference of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held in the Unitarian Church, Middlesbrough, on Monday afternoon, May 5, Mr. Charles Bell, of Redcar, presided. Mr. E. H. Coysh presented a report of the work which had been undertaken by the committee during the past winter, reference being made to the course of Twentieth Century Lectures delivered at Gateshead, Choppington, South Shields, and Sunderland; to the lectures delivered in Newcastle by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century;" and to the course of Sunday evening lectures recently delivered by the Rev. Frank Walters in the Church of the Divine Unity, all of which had been well attended. Mr. Walter Glover, of Choppington, read a paper dealing with the work of the Association, in which he advocated carrying on missionary work in the villages by means of travelling vans, the missioner to have the support of the churches connected with the Association in the district to which appeal was made. An interesting discussion ensued, it being ultimately decided that the Committee should consider the proposal, and, if possible, draw up a scheme for carrying it out. On the motion of the Rev. Charles Travers, of Carlisle, who is a member of the School Board at that place, the following resolution was unanimously agreed to:—"That this meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association condemns the new Education Bill of the Government as being thoroughly reactionary and unjust, and opposed to the interests of education, and expresses the hope that sufficient opposition will be shown to the Bill as will cause it to be withdrawn." In the evening a public meeting was held over which the President of the Association, Alderman J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., of Newcastle-on-Tyne, presided. A large company was present, and interesting speeches were delivered by the Revs. T. W. Frekleton, of Northampton; W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough; Charles Travers, of Carlisle; Francis Wood, of Sunderland; Henry Cross, of Stockton; and Mr. Thomas Paxton, of South Shields. Anthems and solos were admirably rendered during the evening by the church choir; the tea being provided by the ladies of the Middlesbrough congregation.

Newark-on-Trent.—The long-standing debt on the church building has been cleared off, local efforts having raised over £73, and a generous response from friends throughout the country having come in to help. The Sunday-school, which had been closed for a year, was reopened on April 27 by the minister, the Rev. E. R. Hodges.

Nottage.—The General Baptist Chapel was reopened for divine worship on Sunday last, after undergoing renovation and repair. The Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., of Aberdare preached in the morning to a good congregation, and in the afternoon a children's service was conducted by the Rev. W. J. Phillips, who spoke on "The Idylls of the King," and drew the children's attention to the story of the search for The Holy Grail and the Vision of Sir Galahad. The Rev. R. J. Jones also spoke a few earnest words to the children, who sang several beautiful hymns. At six o'clock there was a large congregation, and two sermons were preached, one in Welsh by the Rev. R. J. Jones, the other in English by the Rev. W. J. Phillips. The services were continued on Monday evening, and again there was a good congregation. The devotions were led by the Rev. D. Evans (Congregationalist), and two powerful sermons were preached by the Revs. D. Rees (Pentre), and R. J. Jones. The renovation is very successful, and the services throughout were much appreciated.

Parkstone.—Much interest attaches to the progress of the work here. Commenced on Feb. 16, it has gone on with gratifying results. The need of such a Mission has been abundantly proved by the regular attendance of many from a distance around. The services have been conducted upon Free Christian lines, and have called forth decided expressions of approval from those attending them from time to time. On Sunday, April 27, a most impressive meeting was conducted by the Rev. J. W. Bishop, of Manchester, who, in the course of the service, solemnly dedicated a child to God in the waters of Christian baptism. A most inspiring discourse was preached by Mr. Bishop from the words of the Psalmist, "He restoreth my soul." On Sunday last, May 4, Mr. Councillor Hubbard, L.C.C., conducted the services. For the remainder of the month the work will be in the hands of Mr. Bushrod, who has been in charge from its inception. A social evening will be spent at the hall on May 13, to which the officers of the Southern Association are invited.

Preston.—On Sunday the Percy-street Sunday-school held its anniversary sermons, when the preacher was the Rev. J. J. Wright, F.L.S., of Atherton, who delivered admirable addresses on Sunday-school work to large congregations. In the afternoon a special children's service was held. At each service the children, who had been trained by Miss B Preston, sang a special hymn from a platform which had been erected in front of the rostrum. The chapel had been beautifully decorated with flowers which had been gathered and supplied by the scholars of the school. The offertories realised just over eight guineas.

Shrewsbury.—During the past winter months the Rev. James C. Street has delivered a course of sermons on "The Sacred Books and Religions of the World," which has done much to enlighten the large congregations which gathered together from time to time to hear him.

Southampton.—The Southern Unitarian Association held its quarterly meeting here on 30th ult. There was a large attendance of ministers in the afternoon when important business was transacted. Letters of condolence were sent to the friends of the late Sir N. Chamberlain and Mr. R. Belben. After tea a public meeting was held ; the attendance was sparse, but interesting addresses were given. The Chairman, Mr. J. C. Conway, spoke on the necessity for continuing special Unitarian work. Mr. H. Blessley moved a resolution condemning the Government's Education Bill, and Mr. F. Pinnock seconded, Mr. W. Carter opposed, and the Rev. E. C. Bennett replied to the attack. The Rev. C. C. Coe gave a short but moving address on the necessity for revival and the desirability of keeping the enthusiastic spirit alive. A vote of thanks to the Southampton friends for entertaining the delegates and a vote of thanks to the Chairman for presiding brought the meeting to a close.

Walthamstow.—At the beginning of the year the lady members of the congregation formed a Church Aid Society for the purpose of strengthening the financial position of the Church. A sale of work was held on Thursday and Saturday, April 24 and 26. Lady Durning Lawrence opened the proceedings on Thursday, the President of the Church Aid Society, Miss Edith Jones, in the chair. On Saturday the sale was opened by Mr. J. Harrison, President of the Provincial Assembly ; in the absence of the Vice-President of the Church Aid Society, Mrs. Wood, the Rev. W. H. Rose occupied the chair. The result was satisfactory, and it is hoped to decorate the church with part of the funds raised.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says : "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY

Of London and the South-Eastern Counties.

"ASSEMBLY SUNDAY" (TO-MORROW), MAY 11TH, 1902.

The Members of the Churches on the Roll of the Assembly are asked to note that COLLECTIONS will be made on the above date in aid of the Assembly's Funds.

NOTE.—The date is subject to alteration if not suitable to local arrangements.

FREDERIC ALLEN,
Hon. Secretary.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, CARLISLE.

This Congregation is holding a BAZAAR on MAY 29 and 30. An effort is being made to raise £200, to wipe off an accumulated adverse balance, to pay for repairs caused by the collapse of the heating apparatus, and for other purposes, details whereof have been submitted to, and approved by, the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association. That Association heartily endorses the Appeal. There is no debt on the Church premises, and during the past year a Minister's house has been given by a Member. The Congregation is putting forth every effort, but being almost entirely a working-class congregation, and being in such an isolated position in the centre of a small population, is reluctantly forced to seek outside assistance. The cause is a growing one, its Local Income having more than doubled during the last eight years. The Rev. James Harwood has kindly consented to the publication of the following:—

105, Palace-road, London, S.W.
Feb. 28, 1902.

Last autumn I paid a visit to Carlisle at the request of the Committee of the B. and F. U. Association, and was much impressed by the courage and effectiveness with which Mr. Travers and his people are "holding the fort" in that isolated Outpost of our Faith. They deserve, and I trust will receive, the sympathy and substantial assistance of our friends in other parts of the country.

JAMES HARWOOD.

Contributions in Money or Goods may be sent to, and will be thankfully acknowledged by,

LYDGATE CHAPEL AND SUNDAY SCHOOL.

A Fund of £2,500 is being raised for the following purposes:—

(1.) NEW SUNDAY-SCHOOL, pressingly required.

(2.) A NEW ORGAN for the Chapel, the old instrument being useless and beyond repair.

(3.) To complete a scheme for the improvement of the MINISTER'S STIPEND. £450 needed.

The following donations are gratefully acknowledged:—

WELSH UNITARIAN TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND.

The Welsh Unitarians are making an earnest effort to raise £3,000, and appeal for help to their friends. The objects are to relieve the heavy burdens of debt on the Chapels at Pentre, Clydach Vale, and Trebanos, and generally to promote the spread of Unitarianism in Wales. The Committee have received an expression of cordial sympathy with these objects from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

A full statement, containing the names of the Committee, may be had from the Hon. Sec., Rev. J. HATHREN DAVIES, Cefn Coed, Merthyr Tydfil. Subscriptions may be sent to the Treasurer, D. J. JONES, Esq., 29, Hirwain-road, Aberdare.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AMID all the horror of the destruction of St. Pierre in the French West Indian Island of Martinique, overwhelmed on Thursday week by the terrific eruption of Mont Pelée, there is one point of light to which it is a relief to direct attention. The volcano, which seems hitherto to have given little cause of alarm to the inhabitants of the northern part of the island, which it dominates, became active at midnight on Saturday, May 3, and on the following day St. Pierre was covered by a heavy fall of ashes. On Monday a stream of lava twenty feet high and half a mile wide rushed down the channel of a river to the sea, carrying away a large manufactory and a hundred lives. Further terrifying disturbances followed, but the people do not seem to have imagined that worse could happen. Then on Thursday morning, May 8, just before eight o'clock, the awful doom fell upon St. Pierre, in what appeared to an eye-witness a great wall of fire hurled down upon the city from the mountain. In a moment the storm of burning embers and poisonous vapour was upon them, and the whole city was destroyed, not a creature being left alive, whilst the shipping in the harbour was also overwhelmed. Only one vessel, the British steamship Roddam, escaped. She had only recently put in, so that fortunately steam was up, and the heroism of her captain carried her at last out of the harbour into safety. The Roddam was nearly overwhelmed by the first shock of the fiery storm, and was completely buried in scorching ash, in which a number of the crew perished; but Captain Freeman kept his place upon the bridge, and after the cable had been slipped, though most of the crew were dead, and he himself was dreadfully burned, he succeeded in steering his ship out of the harbour, and reached St. Lucia.

THE eruption of Soufrière at St. Vincent appears to have taken place at the same time as that of Mont Pelée, but while enormous damage has been done, and many hundreds of lives have been lost, there was fortunately no city under the shadow of the mountain, and the tragedy of St. Pierre has not been repeated. Abundant help has been immediately sent from the United States and from the neighbouring islands, the sympathy of all the great countries being marked by generous gifts towards relief of the distress. At the request of the Colonial Secretary, the Lord Mayor has opened a Relief Fund for St Vincent.

THE Congregational Union of England and Wales met at the Memorial Hall on Monday, the President, Dr. Caleb Scott, Principal of the Lancashire Independent College, being unfortunately too ill to be present. Dr. Horton was elected by 608 votes out of 761 to succeed to the Presidency, and received an enthusiastic greeting. Questions relating to the colleges and a proposed superannuation fund were discussed. On Tuesday the Union met in the City Temple, when Dr. Caleb Scott's Presidential Address was read by the Rev. J. R. Bailey, of Eccles. The address having touched upon several matters of practical interest, deprecated the fear of enlightened criticism, and pleaded strongly for the supremacy of Christ. The attraction of Unitarian writers to Christ was noted, but it was argued that this was not sufficient, nor was the "value-judgment" of Christ as God, according to the Ritschlian School, sufficient; they must go further and acknowledge Him as God to thought as well as to feeling. The address in conclusion dwelt upon the supreme truth of the Fatherhood of God. An elaborate report on the replies of the county Unions and churches as to Dr. Parker's proposals for organising a United Congregational Church was presented, and an animated debated followed. Dr. Hunter strenuously opposed the scheme, objecting to any further organisation as opposed to the true principle of Independency, but a resolution authorising the preparation of a scheme "to unite congregational churches more closely for common purposes" was carried by an overwhelming majority.

VISITORS to Essex Hall next week are sure to be attracted to the Bookroom, and will find there much that is good, both old and new: Dr. Brooke Herford's new book, with a delightful portrait and a quaint title, of which we publish a notice this week; Dr. M. J. Savage's last volume on the Permanent and Transient in Religion, a book which cannot fail to be helpful to many readers; and (we trust) the new and revised edition of the Essex Hall Hymnal. But among more substantial works we beg that two recently published pamphlets may not be overlooked: "The Nation's Peril," by T. J. Hardy, B.A., a most timely and cogent appeal for sincerity in religion, and "The Religion of Oliver Wendell Holmes," by W. G. Tarrant, B.A.

A LETTER from Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, of Calcutta, formerly one of our Indian students at Manchester College, Oxford, expresses the deep regret felt by the members of the Brahmo Somaj at the death of Miss C. A. Martineau, and tells of the deep interest she took in their work, and especially in the work of their Sunday-school. It appears that every year Miss Martineau was in the habit of sending over the new publications of the Sunday-school Association for the use of the Brahmo teachers and scholars, and Mr. Sarkar is commissioned by the authorities and teachers of the school to express their deep sense of loss in the death of their friend. Is it too much to hope that some other friend will carry on this kindly habit, and that the publications of the Association will still find their way to the Calcutta school?

AT their meeting on Monday the Executive Committee of the Liberation Society adopted the following resolutions:—

1. The Committee have seen with the greatest satisfaction that, as the result of an examination of its provisions, the Education Bill of the Government has been emphatically condemned by numerous public bodies of the most varied character; as altogether failing to meet existing educational needs; as aiming at the advancement of ecclesiastical rather than educational interests; as destroying, without adequate cause, an educational system of proved efficiency; as further endowing, and promoting the multiplication of, denominational schools under private management, and as being certain to cause confusion, difficulty, and religious strife.

2. The Committee recognise with pleasure the great ability and the determination with which the Liberal Party in the House of Commons has given expression to the conviction and feelings with which the measure is regarded in this country, and confidently anticipate that they will continue to offer uncompromising resistance to the Bill at all its future stages.

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

3. Notwithstanding the second reading of the Bill by a large majority, the Committee call upon the friends of religious equality to persist in their efforts to convince their fellow-countrymen of the danger with which it threatens the nation. In particular they are urged to acquaint themselves with the amendments which will be moved to modify the worst provisions of the Bill, and to make known their views to their representatives in Parliament, irrespective of party distinctions. And, as it may be that the Government will endeavour to pass the Bill as quickly as possible, there should be prompt, as well as vigorous, action on the part of its opponents.

THE Conference of the Women's National Liberal Association meeting at Essex Hall on Wednesday, under the presidency of Mrs. Sydney Buxton, unanimously passed the following resolution :—

That the Education Bill of the Government ought to be rejected because, while imposing heavy additional burdens on the ratepayers, it withholds from them all effective control over denominational schools; it deprives them of the right to elect women on local educational authorities and committees; it is calculated to intensify sectarian strife, and it holds out no prospect of improved educational efficiency.

THE following is the resolution of the Chowbent congregation :—

This congregation cordially approves of the principle that within a certain area there should be but one authority for the co-ordination and control of all grades of education, provided that the areas are large but not unwieldy, and provided the educational authority is in close touch with the electorate and holds its power directly from the ratepayers. But the congregation views with grave distrust the provisions of the Education Bill now before the House of Commons so far as its treatment of large Board Schools is concerned, and strongly condemns those sections of the Bill which would leave the management of thousands of schools in the hands of private persons, while calling upon the community to provide the whole cost of maintenance. The congregation is of opinion that no settlement of the education question can be equitable which violates the principle that, where the people are called upon to pay, the people should rule through their duly-elected representatives, or that permits the continued imposition of ecclesiastical or theological tests upon teachers in rate-supported schools. That in particular the congregation are of opinion that Section 1, which provides that councils of boroughs with a population of over 10,000, and of urban districts, with a population of over 20,000, shall be the Local Education Authorities under the Act, should be amended by providing that councils of urban districts with a population of over 10,000 shall be the Local Education Authorities under the Act.

THE GLEAM.

Follow the gleam, lad, come what may,
Whatever the world and folk may say.

Follow the Voice within thy breast;
List! it shall tell thee what is best.

Then over valley and over steep
A brooding Care thy steps shall keep,

Which, though thou walk the way of death,
Still broodeth on, nor slumbereth.

LITERATURE.

DR. BROOKE HERFORD'S NEW BOOK.*

Eight years ago Dr. Herford gave us a volume of sermons of "Courage and Cheer," speaking out of a heart long tried in the many labours of an active ministry, full of wholesome strength and sympathy with all human needs, apt in the art of counsel and encouragement. His new volume "The Small End of Great Problems," which takes its title from the opening discourse, speaks to us with the same voice of genial wisdom and direct manly sense, long familiar to many hearers on both sides of the Atlantic. The book comes to us as a most welcome gift at the close of his long ministry, touched with the pathos of his illness, which forbids us to hope that we shall hear the living voice again. He was unable himself to attend to the proofs, or we may be sure that the name of his old teacher John James Tayler would not have been misspelt, and the quotation from Whittier would have been correctly given, where he says that

> Death seems but a covered way
> Which opens into light;

but the finished book has been placed in Dr. Herford's hands and his friends will be delighted to see the admirable portrait, which he himself could hardly be persuaded to allow to be included in it.

The title of the book marks not only the subject of the first discourse, but a prevailing purpose which finds expression again and again throughout its pages, as in the sermons on "The Human Heart of God" and "The Mystery of Pain." We are too apt, Dr. Herford pleads, to be staggered by the great questions of life, problems of duty, of religion and of Nature, of God and time and eternity; our wisdom is to begin with the small beginnings, at the centre of our own life, where the light is clearest—where duty is most certain and God is nearest to us, and then we are best able to interpret the greater and more difficult facts of life and the wider sweep of Divine providence both in Nature and in history. This, he points out, was also the method of Jesus:—

> There is the marvellous thing in Christ—his mighty opening of man's thought to the Divine surroundings and infinities of life—while yet constantly bringing men down to the common things close about them as the way to that Divine. Often men would like to stay up in the cloudlands of Divine mystery—but Christianity won't let them. It keeps bringing them back to the work and the neighbour and the little child. Christianity is doing this to-day. It is just this which is making society impatient of mere abstruse creeds, which is making the churches crave less of the Apocalypse and more of the Sermon on the Mount; and which is so making them less divided in their interpretations of the Heavenly Mysteries and more united in trying at this nearer end of things to make this common world a more wholesome, honest and happier place.

If we begin thus at "the small end," as Dr. Herford says, we find the true way both in practical things and theoretical, and it becomes clear to us that the near and human things are part of the Divine, and what is best in man gives us assured faith in God.

So comes that living, confident faith which the world is longing for to-day—a faith not suspended, as it were, from some dim authority of ancient texts, but a faith rooted in the common need and longing of mankind; a faith climbing upwards through plant and star, and through the little child and the grown man, and through the long growth of the Bible, and the perfect outcome of Christ—through all this, climbing upward to the Infinite Fatherhood and the eternal life of Heaven. So faith grows out of fact, and in the growing ever verifies itself, and throws back on the fact an ever nobler meaning; and thought widens and life grows larger, and the world of man moves onwards—not yet into any clear knowledge, indeed—but surely towards it; towards it, enough to make us sure that our faith is not a baseless dream, but a true light that lightens towards the Infinite and the Divine.

This thought is further illustrated in the sermons on "The Unseen Things the Most Real," and on "Belief in Things, Unproven," showing, as in the last sermon, on "The Inspirations of Science," how much the closer and deeper study of Nature has done of recent years to give a truer sense of the mystery of life and the reality of spiritual things, while always the facts of human duty and affection and aspiration are of greater moment than any other facts of Nature, though God is in all, and over all.

One of the most characteristic sermons in this volume is on "The Bugbear of the Unknowable," and we cannot refrain from reproducing here two passages, both for the sake of their statement of the fundamental position, and for the personal touch in the first passage:—

> "I like to say my morning prayer looking out of the window. Thanksgiving, to every true heart, comes naturally anywhere—just as the mercies of the day come to us in the common happenings of life; but for prayer I seem to want, as Daniel did, the open window, some outlook on earth and sky, and all the wonderful world, even if it may be only the grass and flowers of some common garden, or even a tree or two above the city roofs—but always something of the sky and the wonderful light. I dare say many of you who read this feel the same—and if you do, you will have felt how, often, the very first thought as you look out is this wonder of the Infinite mystery. 'Oh Thou to whom I am praying, how I long to know Thee, to know what Thou art!' Thoughts of the awful vastness of this universe, of which what one sees is but the tiniest fragment, throng into the heart, sometimes almost dazing one. 'Oh! Thou infinite mystery, what art Thou? Art Thou such a being that thou knowest us poor human creatures, and that I, or what I am, or what I do or suffer, or anything I am thinking or saying in my little heart of worshipping, can be anything to Thee?'
> "Yes; there is the unknowableness. But then comes, quickly following, almost as if it were part of the same thought, the sense that something means it all. Something 'means' it. That is the word which to me seems the master key of the perplexity. I do not say the key out of the mystery, but the key into it—so that it seems to open the door into the mystery, that I may look into it, and enter into it, feeling that my thoughts are not simply wandering into nothingness, but into the innermost realities of the universe and a presence of mysterious life."

> "So I for one am not going to let that bugbear of the 'unknown' oppress me, or drive me from the old faith which all through the best ages of man's growth has looked up with trust and adoration as to God, albeit unable to find Him out in any distinctness or perfection. As I walk through the House Beautiful of the world, I will rejoice in the sunshine, feel the awe of the storm, and bow before the wonders which make the whole more wonderful from year to year, and though I may not see the Lord of the House Beautiful, face to face, I will not call Him 'unknown.' I cannot but join hands with those—all the nameless multitude of souls, who through the long procession of the generations, have never seen His face yet never felt Him a mere vast unknown, but the dear presence of Infinite love and goodness. And where our vision, at times, seems very dim, there are purer and holier ones, who have seen with purer hearts, and with the faith which is more than outward sight. Let us walk with them—and most of all with the great leader of the pure in heart—let us walk with Him in his ways of prayer, trust and helpful love, and I think it will still be with us, as it has been with so many, that he will show us the Father, make very close and real the Infinite Fatherhood, and help us to walk and live if not yet in the light yet always towards it!"

There are twenty-one sermons in this book, but without their texts. Whether there was any subtle purpose in this omission we do not know—whether, perhaps, there was a hope to entice those who will on no account read "sermons," but are most in need of them, and might, perhaps, opening an attractive volume of essays, find themselves unawares listening to this wise and persuasive voice. But the text does not seriously matter, for the subject is always there clearly stated at the outset; except, perhaps, in the one sermon on "The Mystery of Mind," which begins: "Paul here touches one of the deep perplexities of life"—and we find ourselves asking, where? As regards the clear statement of the subject at the beginning of every sermon, there are many preachers who might well take a lesson from Dr. Herford.

Among the subjects here treated are "The Healing Forces of God," "The World's Debt to Christ," "The Veiled Life in Man," "The Mystery of Goodness," "The Nearness and Reality of the Heavenly World." The dogmatic theologian may not find much satisfaction in such sermons as these, but those who are hungering for religion which shall sustain and uplift the natural life of man, and open the way to clearer vision of the truth of God, will do wisely to turn to these pages, and will hardly fail to acknowledge, with many hearers of these spoken words, their debt of gratitude to a true and helpful friend.

In conclusion, we will add one more extract, the last sentences of the sermon on "Immortality":—

> "As Tennyson has said—who is the very poet of the larger hope—
> Death's true name—
> Is onward; no discordance in the roll
> And march of that eternal harmony
> Whereto the worlds beat time.

* "The Small End of Great Problems." By Brooke Herford, D.D., late Minister of Rosslyn-hill Chapel, London, sometime Preacher to Harvard University, U.S.A. Longmans, Green and Co. 6s. net.

We know not how it is to be, or where. But somehow, somewhere, whether we wish for it or not, we know, by the dumb craving of the ordered world, as well as by the uttered hope of holiest souls, that God will yet fulfil us into something better than the fragments that we are. And so we wait, and work and watch and do the best we may, or bow our heads in sorrow that our doing is so much below our best—and as His laws ordain we let life go, or fall asleep, but always for some further greater life beyond the shadows and the sleeping."

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

This month's Contemporary, as we noted last week, opens with an elaborate criticism of the Government's Education Bill by Mr. Lyulph Stanley. The true policy, he says in conclusion, would be not to abolish but to improve our School Boards, of which the smaller areas might will be moderately enlarged, and altogether to improve our elementary system, not to mutilate and curtail it. And he adds :—

Those who have life and strength before them will have to begin the work anew if this Bill becomes law. Municipal bodies will have to learn this new work, and in spite of the wide county area which excludes those in humbler positions from taking part in administration, renewed efforts must be made. The Education Committee, which will sit in secret and whose minutes and reports will not be, as of right, open to access by the ratepayers, like the documents of the School Board, must be vivified and made sensitive to public opinion. If necessary, in order to correct the packing of the Education Committee, contemplated by the Bill, organisation will have to be introduced into the County Council in order to secure such a preponderating majority of the representative members, who share the views of the majority of the Council, that the representatives of interests shall be powerless. It is a sad thing that the work of education, which demands the peaceful attention of those concerned in it for really educational problems, should be pursued, like the rebuilding of Jerusalem, with the sword in one hand and the trowel in the other. But till the intrusion of ecclesiasticism into politics is completely done away with, and citizens can meet and work on a purely civic basis, those who care for popular progress must not discontinue but redouble their efforts.

Mr. Bryce's article on the "Education Bill" in the Nineteenth Century and After we also noted last week. In the Fortnightly, Mr. Cloudesley Brereton, who has an article on the same subject also in the Monthly, writes on "An Education Bill of Settlement," meeting various objections, as that Parliament, though not elected ad hoc, yet has to deal with education, and that the proposed education committee, though not directly elected by the people, will be as much a representative body as the Cabinet. In the Monthly he urges that the permissive clause must be dropped and that the presence of women on the Education Committee should be made compulsory. The prospect of one authority held out by the Bill he regards as so vital and full of hope for education, that no true friend of education should incur the responsibility of its rejection. The article ends with an absurd reference to Little Englanders. A more attractive article is the warm appreciation of "Joseph Joachim: Maker of Music," by Mr. D. F. Tovey, with which there is a welcome portrait of the great violinist, from a private photograph by Frl. J. Eilert. Mr. T. A. Cook completes his article on "The Shell of Leonardo," with some beautiful illustrations of spiral staircases.

In the Nineteenth Century and After there are two replies to Miss M. F. Johnston's article of last month on Hospital Nurses. The Hon. Sydney Holland, writing from a wide experience of nurses, complains that Miss Johnston's attack was grossly unfair and showed a flagrant disregard of the true proportions between good and bad nurses, and he concludes :—

Think of the multitude of earnest, noble-minded, large-hearted women who are discharging their duties faithfully by night and by day, "not with eye service as men pleasers," but in all simplicity ministering to the sick, the querulous, the grateful and the ungrateful, the loved and the unloved, the living and the dying, with no thought of self, with that tenderness of human pity which brings the divine very near to us, and tell me if the sum of this good work, which goes on around us from morning till night and from night till morning, is not sufficient to wipe out the offences of the unworthy.

In the Contemporary there is an article by Miss Frances Power Cobbe on "Schadenfrede," "Pleasure in the misfortunes of others," tracing the various forms of cruelty which, it is maintained, could hardly have become habitual unless the perpetrators had found some pleasure in them, and then noting changes for the better which have taken place within the writer's memory. "Schadenfrede," which we take to describe the pleasure derived from seeing mischief done or other people get into trouble, will not, perhaps, in strictness cover the feeling which goes along with mere ruthlessness, or stupid or diabolical cruelty, but the dreadful facts remain, by whatever name they may be described. Among these facts must be reckoned the stimulus given to ferocity in the hand-to-hand conflicts of war, and a yet further deteriorating influence exerted by war. Of this Miss Cobbe writes :—

Quite apart from this "fierce joy" of actual battle, War has unquestionably a tendency on a gigantic scale to harden the heart, not only of the actual combatants, but of the nations which have to share the dreadful excitement and to triumph over tender feelings of numberless kinds. It has seemed to me, that since this over-to-be-deplored South African War has been going on, there has been a new undercurrent of ferocity dimly discernible through the whole spirit of the nation.

As to the changes for the better which have taken place, Miss Cobbe notes the advance of feeling on the subject of consideration for dumb animals (the tolerance of vivisection being the great exception), greater kindliness in personal and literary criticism, and the marked change in the attitude of religious people towards the doctrine of an eternal hell. Referring to the old days of the Saturday Review, Miss Cobbe adds a good note :—

After the long lapse of years I may amuse the reader by narrating how the Editor first published a bitter review of one of my books, and then very shortly after invited me, through my publishers, to join his staff. My message in reply was :—"Tell Mr. Cook that if his review of my 'Studies' was a fair and just one I am not good enough to be his contributor. If it was unfair and unjust, his Review is not good enough for me."

Dr. P. T. Forsyth contributes to the same number an article on "The Evangelical Basis of Free Churchism," taking very high ground and incidentally administering a good deal of rebuke to members of Free Churches who do not come up to his ideal of a vital faith in this "Pelagian, Franciscan, Erastian time." For our own part, we confess to a large amount of sympathy with those other people, but then we are by no means "evangelical" in Dr. Forsyth's sense. As to the relation of Free Churches to an establishment, Dr. Forsyth speaks in no uncertain tone :—

The desire is sometimes expressed by liberal Churchmen to reform the obstacles which prevent the Nonconformists from re-entering the National Church. This is well meant, but it rests upon an entire misunderstanding of our case. What we protest against is not the abuses but the existence, the principle, of a National Church. We say that the National Church is one of the chief reasons for the scarcity of national Christianity. The grievance is not ours but the Spirit's. The whole Church and Gospel throughout the world is a solid thing, and it all suffers loss, and all has a lower temperature, because one part of it suffers establishment. This plea is not a polemic; or, if it be, the polemic is not ours. It is not self-will. It is the Lord's controversy. It is the native freedom of the Spirit asserting itself in us. The polemic is theirs who pen the Spirit in their own fold. Will they own us as true churches? Will they bless not only our philanthropy, but our ministry? Will they welcome our ministers as our ministers? That is the only irenic possible.

In the Westminster Review those who may have been interested in the questions raised by Mr. Manning's recent college address on "The Story of the Targums," and the appendix subsequently published on "The Transition from Hebrew to Aramaic," will find a notice of these pamphlets, which takes a more favourable view of their value than our reviewer was able to express.

"RELIGIOUS LIBERALISM IN MODERN ENGLISH PAINTING."

BY THE REV. EDGAR I. FRIPP, B.A.*

II.

Now, as we might expect, the change of sentiment that I have been tracing, on the one hand toward Nature, and on the other toward human life, and especially child-life, has been accompanied by a new feeling about matters more directly and confessedly religious. Such subjects as the Bible, the Church, the life and spirit of Jesus Christ, belief in God and the life to come, have been treated in painting with a more liberal and enlightened reverence. Hogarth, moral as he was—intensely and savagely moral—was never religious in his art, except by his denunciation of cant and hypocrisy. Nor do we find any religious subject in English painting which betrays warmth or imagination before William Blake. Like Burns, Blake was a child of the French Revolution, and a revolutionist in every part of him. He was both a painter and a poet, and in his pictures and his verse—sometimes they were combined—he expressed a republican hatred of oppression, in Church and State, theology and Government, and a republican pity for everything weak and inoffensive. People called him mad, and perhaps he was at times. He suffered enough from man's brutal behaviour and opinions to go out of his mind. Cowper did also. But Blake, clinging to the ideas of freedom and brotherhood and equality, and following them, as he thought, to their logical consequences, made war upon convention, in art and literature as well as in politics, social order and decorum, and religion. He was one of the first since Milton to admire Gothic architecture and to love Chaucer. His paintings are extraordinary in their subjects and technique, but, as his contemporaries said, "damned good," sometimes, "to steal from." There are three designs for a strange poem of his called "The Gates of Paradise"—though, perhaps, the poem is only a commentary on the illustrations. God's mercy and forgiveness are the gates, and the designs represent the various experiences of man which awaken his need of the divine love. The 9th, entitled "I want! I want!" is Aspiration—love and youth mounting a ladder which reaches from the earth to the heavens. The 10th, "Help! Help!" is Despair, a man drowning in mid-ocean with his arm lifted to the silent sky. The 14th is called "The Traveller hasteth in the evening," symbol of man passing from earthly things to heavenly:

> But when once I did descry
> The Immortal Man that cannot die,
> Through evening shades I haste away
> To close the labours of the day.

The originality of these rough sketches, and of more careful work, such as the series on "Job," is a mine of gold after the dull waste of preceding and contemporary religious painting.

But Blake had no followers, and few admirers until the Pre-Raphaelite movement found him out and received inspiration from his genius. In 1844-5 young Madox Brown met in Rome with the German Catholic painters, Overbeck and Cornelius, who, with the aim of reviving the devout and symbolical work of the old Catholic masters, had formed themselves, as far back as 1810, into a mediæval or Pre-Raphaelite brotherhood. Brown brought the idea to England, where it was seized upon by his pupils, Holman Hunt and Rossetti, and their friend Millais. With Noël Paton, Charles Collins and two or three more, they set up an English Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood with vows not to drink, nor smoke nor swear, and to devote themselves to serious, conscientious work after the manner of the mediævalists.

Interest in the middle ages was at that time new and very keen. Scott's novels, the High Church movement at Oxford, the study of Dante—in which Rossetti's father was a pioneer—and Ruskin's discoveries and revelations of the greatness of the mediæval cities he was studying, Florence, Venice, and Verona, set men doubting whether the Renaissance and Reformation of the sixteenth century were such unmixed blessings as they had been led by Protestant teaching to believe. It dawned upon the art-world that Raphael and Michael Angelo instead of initiating a new era were survivors of a noble religious past, the last ripe fruit with the worm in it; their greatness consisting in their connection with the Gothic age; their weakness in their approximation to the heathen ideals of Greece and Rome, and to the modern worship of the understanding. Raphael stands in a remarkable manner between the mediæval and the modern. His later work bears unmistakable signs of the scepticism and worldliness of the Vatican. Look at his picture of "The Temptation." It is no longer a tragic theme. The fate of the human race does not hang upon it. Raphael can look at it very calmly and treat it as an occasion for good flesh-painting and perspective. Eve is scarcely distinguishable from Venus. The faces lack expression, and except that the subject is biblical the picture is wholly pagan. But see now an early work by Raphael, when he was under the influence not of Rome but of Umbria, a pupil of the old-fashioned Perugino and a devout believer, the "Granduca Madonna." The young artist has put his whole strength into the Madonna's face and hands, the parts of the body which express the soul. This, if you will allow the term, might be called a Pre-Raphaelite Raphael, the other a Post-Raphaelite Raphael. So as we go back, to earlier and holier influences, to Botticelli and Fra Angelico, Giotto and Cimabue, knowledge lessens but the spirit deepens, until we come to St. Francis himself, the spiritual founder of mediæval Italy, and the most perfect character in Christendom since Jesus Christ.

Feeling this, our school of young painters called themselves Pre-Raphaelites and went to work with something of the feeling of Giotto that art should be a means of teaching the gospel to the people. Millais, the most gifted, though the youngest of the group, in 1850 finished his "Jesus in the House of His Parents." The Christ-child has cut his hand playing with a nail in the carpenter's shop. The father looks at the wound, which is in the middle of the palm—where another nail will some day be driven, a thought full of anguish to the mother's heart. A boy older and robuster, John the Baptist, brings water to wash away the blood. Observe the sheep in the fold outside. They have heard the cry and look up; for already they know the voice of the Good Shepherd. Poetic touches in this picture, as in Millais's later "Evil One sowing Tares" (see the wolf and serpent, types of sin, and the gathering light from which Satan will flee), suggest the influence of Rossetti, whose imagination, stirred by the study of Dante, was always teeming with spiritual symbolism. His "Girlhood of the Virgin" was painted before Millais's picture, in 1849. Mary sits with her mother at home, while her father ties up the vine outside the casement, when her eyes are suddenly opened to spiritual things and she beholds her guardian-angel looking at her with serious regard and affection as the future mother of the Christ. The annunciation has not yet come. The dove, type of the Holy Spirit, watches her, waiting the signal to descend. Observe the lily, the symbol of purity, and the rushes on the floor, Dante's symbol of meekness. Equally original, and far better painted is the "Annunciation" itself, finished in 1850. The angel wakes Mary from her sleep on the plain pallet bed, bringing her the lily, and the dove flies in at the window. Half in a dream she wonders in her thoughtful face what the message can be. True to the spirit of Fra Angelico and Cimabue, Rossetti has made the mental predominate completely over the physical. Nobody would mistake this Virgin for a Venus. And even more than they, Rossetti has been concerned with ideas rather than dogmas, or, perhaps I should say, with spiritual truths rather than historical. The mediævals believed firmly in the letter of the Scripture and the Church tradition, but they filled it with noble suggestion and symbol which remain true and beautiful though the supposed event depicted may be discredited. In Rossetti's case we need not suppose that he believed in the actual visitations of the angel and the dove. At any rate, the extraordinary freedom he and the Pre-Raphaelites generally took with Scripture is obvious and worth noticing. Take his "Mary Magdalene," which is based on undoubted fact but in no sense Palestinian and almost entirely an allegory. The Magdalene in a procession of pleasure-seekers, piping and garlanded, passes the house of Simon and catches the eye of Jesus through the doorway. To the astonishment of her companions she stops short, tears the flowers from her hair, and mounts the steps, in spite of a girl and a youth who try to dissuade her, to fling herself at the Saviour's feet. Notice the detail, the children selling flowers and flasks of wine—the flowers that fade and the wine that intoxicates; the hen on the left in the foreground, which typifies the home, being only found, like the dog, in the haunts of men; and the stag on the right, eating the vine-leaves, the symbol of man's soul ("as pants the hart for cooling streams") feeding on the True Vine, which is Christ.

Another picture by Rossetti, profoundly religious, if I understand it rightly, takes us outside the Bible altogether. A young husband, a butcher, driving his cart over Blackfriars Bridge, sees the wife who has deserted him to live a gay life in London, and catching her he endeavours to persuade her to return. The man, in this very modern garb, is Jesus Christ, and his bride is the Church or the World. Observe the calf in the net, the symbol of sacrifice for man's use, in terrible contrast to the woman, who, in the entanglements of her rich dress and finery, typifies sacrifice for man's evil.

Later Rossetti turned to his beloved Dante for subjects, and ceased, as Millais did, to be a directly religious painter. Madox Brown, too, who under Rossetti's influence painted his "Christ washing Peter's feet," followed an independent course, producing, under Carlyle's influence, studies of Cromwell and a fine Socialistic picture called "Work." But Holman Hunt has continued in the Pre-Raphaelite way, painting little else than consciously religious and Biblical subjects. "The Light of the World" is a poetic representation—broad enough to attract both Catholic and Protestant, Trinitarian and Unitarian—of the text "Behold, I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice and open the door, I will come in to him and will sup with him, and he with me." Christ, with the light of the Holy Spirit in his face, and the dimmer, more human light of the written Word in his left hand, clad in the robes of his priestly office and crowned with thorns and the jewels that accompany them, knocks at the door of the human heart, which is overgrown with ivy and bramble and weeds. On the ground, ungathered, are apples, the fruits of life which are lost. To get nearer to the Bible spirit Hunt spent a couple of years in Palestine and painted the wonderful "Scapegoat," based on Leviticus xvi. 21. Writing to Millais from the East he said :—

> My notion is to represent this accursed animal with the mark of the priest's hands on his head and a scarlet ribbon which was tied to him, escaped in horror and alarm to the plain of the Dead Sea, and in a death-thirst turning away from the bitterness of this sea of sin.

Thus he gives a symbolical image of Jesus Christ in the loneliness and the thirst of his death, the type of sacrifice and suffering for the sake of others. The weary animal, ready to drop with fatigue, stands above its hoofs in the salt sand; behind, lit by the setting sun, are the hills beyond Jordan; the evening gloom begins to gather over the pestilent lake, night is coming on, and skeletons on the shore foreshadow the end. Hunt went again to the Holy Land to work at his "Jesus in the Temple." Part of it was done in Jerusalem, but it shows no trace of mere antiquarianism. It gives us the spirit far more than the letter of the story. The young prophet among the doctors may stand for new Christian truth at this day, or at any time, in the midst, as I have said, of the various hardnesses, semi-liberalisms, and indifferences of religious thought. On the left is an old rabbi, blind, hugging the book of the law. Second to him, gazing at Jesus, is a thoughtful teacher who has been impressed by what he has heard, but will not be moved to action, a kind of Hamlet Christian whose fine thoughts will evaporate in mere dreams and fancies. Another, in the centre, with a dish of wine, is satisfied that he has disposed of the young heretic's arguments. Next to Jesus is a comfortable old fellow who is not going to be upset by the matter either way. Outside the Temple, a blind beggar, type of human misery heard with such difficulty in the churches, calls to the passer-by. And at the bottom of the steps masons are in the act of rejecting a corner-stone.

Of other religious paintings by the Pre-Raphaelite School, I must be content to refer to Collins's "Convent Thoughts"—a purely High Church and imitative picture reviving the old monasticism and its quiet sanctity, its love of flowers (which are very beautifully painted) and its missal painting, without a thought for present-day problems; to Cowper's "Good Samaritan," which gives with vivid, photographic force the essential features of the widest and broadest of all the parables; and to Burton's fine allegorical picture "The World's Gratitude"—Jesus in prison and crowned with thorns, looking upon us through the bars which we have set up between us and him. Notice the vine leaves—leaves of the Tree apart from whom we can do nothing.

It is remarkable, and a sign, I fear, of the lack of religion among us, that this deep mine has not been further developed. It is capable of endless working. Burne-Jones and Watts have dug in it, the former in his "Days of Creation," which deals with the old Genesis story as purest religious poetry, the latter in such works as the Eve trilogy and "The Return of Cain"; but their proper spheres are elsewhere, in the fields of mediæval and classical mythology. Watts has put his Christian faith into classical imagery, employing the nude in a manner quite alien to the Pre-Raphaelite tradition, as in "Love and Life." Study in Rome of the antique statuary led him to paint in this rather than the ascetic medium, but he is absolutely true to the Pre-Raphaelite ideal that a picture should not "so much charm the eye as suggest great thoughts and kindle all that is best and noblest in humanity"—an ideal that at once separates him from classicists like Leighton and Alma Tadema. In an age of doubt and questioning he has been a wrestler against the powers of darkness, painting the essentials of faith. Love, conscience, righteousness, God, immortality are the truths that stand amid the drifting stream of system and creed, firm and unshaken, the eternal foundations of the Church of God. He has survived the period of the deep intellectual gloom reflected in his "Hope." Critics who complain that the blindfolded figure with one string to her harp represents Despondency rather than Hope, have forgotten the dark days of twenty and twenty-five years ago when God Himself seemed almost blotted out of existence by the doctrine of Evolution. We know better now. Our hope is weak rather in modern civilisation than in God and the ultimate triumph of good.

But here I must conclude with a remark by Watts that applies to the whole movement of English painting I have been trying, very briefly, to trace :—

> I teach great truths, but I do not dogmatise. I purposely avoid all reference to creeds and appeal to men of all ages and every faith. I lead them to the church door, and then they can go in and see God in their own way.

OBITUARY.

MRS. HUNTER, SIDMOUTH.

THE present writer records with much regret the death, after a short illness, of Mrs. Sarah Hunter, widow of the Rev. Thomas Hunter, formerly, for twenty years, Secretary and Librarian of Dr. Williams's Trust, London. Mrs. Hunter had attained the great age of ninety in good general health just a week before her death, and retained remarkable physical vigour and a lively interest in passing events and the society of her friends. She was the eldest daughter, by his second wife, of Mr. George Filliter, of Wareham, the representative of an old and well-known family in that part of Dorset. Mr. and Mrs. Hunter removed to Sidmouth about sixteen years ago, soon after his retirement from the library, and both took much interest in the Old Meeting, of which Mrs. Hunter was a liberal supporter, and a constant attendant till within a fortnight of her death. The interment took place on Tuesday morning in the beautiful little cemetery of Sidmouth, where the remains of Mr. Hunter were buried four years ago. The Rev. William Agar officiated, and several members of the Old Meeting were present as a mark of respect and affection. T. L. M.

RELIGION AND THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.

SIR,—Rev. E. I. Fripp, as reported by your paper of May 10, says: "150 years ago we had no landscape. Educated persons did not care for Nature. . . The glory of mountains and skies was absent from their theology as from the poetry of the time, or hidden under pompous phraseology." Further down the page, Gray's Elegy is found "skied" in Mr. Fripp's picture gallery, if not indeed dismissed to the lumber-room. And altogether that period of our era has been having a bad time of it, he being judge.

As to painting on canvas it would be idle for me to say a word. But the extracts indicate speech at large, and that Mr. Fripp is repeating against eighteenth-century writers a somewhat superficial if not flippant criticism such as would dub Irishmen rogues and Scotchmen hucksters, &c.

One swallow cannot make a summer; nor can Pope suffice to furnish the literature of a century. Connect Gray's Elegy with General Wolfe's avowal of less pleasure in his anticipated capture of Quebec than in such authorship; picture Sam Johnson, who hasted to illustrate the movements of that new wonder of Creation, Australia's Kangaroo, subjecting himself to all the discomforts of Highland mountains and skies whilst keeping a look-out for some traces of the poet (?) of storm and darkness, Ossian Macpherson; conceive of Goldsmith on the banks of the Loire, and 'mid the fastnesses of the Alps; view Addison on the Tyrrhene seas—"In dreadful whirls we hung high on the broken wave"; nor forget the hills and valley of Mirza's vision; and one wonders what is meant when it is said these men failed to paint Nature. Time would fail to tell of Thomson, Cowper, Falconer, Akenside, Crabbe, Bloomfield, &c., whose productions, perhaps, will be catalogued by our Mansfield friend as "pompous phraseology."

He seems to have some regard for Burns. This augurs well. And if he allows a product of the poorly-esteemed century, Campbell discoursing of Pope and affirming "Nature includes artificial forms and manners," to have known at least as much of Nature as Mr. Fripp's mind's eye has yet beheld; and, further, if he listen to Gray declaring "not a precipice, not a torrent, not a cliff but is pregnant with religion and poetry," our co-mates and brothers in exile who happen to be at Mansfield may yet be able to bless Mr. Fripp when he has found that more tuneful tongue which doubtless he would wish to own in the service of Him who did not leave the eighteenth century a barren waste.

HOGARTH.

SIR,—The Rev. Edgar I. Fripp's lecture on "Religious Liberalism in Modern English Painting," which appeared in "THE INQUIRER" of the 10th inst., is no less suggestive than interesting, and I for one read it with pleasure. Permit me, however, to suggest that the concluding phrase—"the fierce and coarse malignity of Hogarth"—borders on injustice to the memory of the founder of the English School of Painting.

Here was a man who had so great a horror and hatred of what he conceived to be immorality, that instead of following the example of only too many men of genius, who have painted merely to please, he devoted his artistic gifts to the service of morality. Sardonic he might be, and often was, although satirical is a better term for the characterisation of his sermons in paint. As Mr. Fripp pointed out, "Hogarth's own satire was part of an effort towards better things."

In the eighteenth century it appears to have been held of many that man may be frightened into the straight and narrow way, or, at the least, the placing of the outcome of evil-doing before the mind's eye can but have a salutary effect. Such ideas are perhaps to be traced to the Middle Ages, when the frescoes and altar-pieces adorning the churches stood for the poor instead of books, and sometimes represented and contrasted the blessedness of the Saved with the Agonies of the Damned. (For a late example see Memlinc's Dantzig altar-piece.) But placing their origin aside, suffice it to say that such ideas were prevalent in the eighteenth century, and they are still rife amongst many sincere if mistaken reformers, whom, although their ways are not as our ways, to accuse of "fierce and coarse malignity" would be grossly unfair, when oftentimes the seeming bitterness is but, at one and the same time, the result and measure of their love of righteousness. And so, I suggest, Hogarth is not to be convicted of "fierce and coarse malignity" although he painted the "Marriage à la Mode," and the rest of "those wonderful unspoken sermons against vice and folly."

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"The Birds of Killingworth."

HAVE you ever thought how much of the pleasure and happiness of our lives we owe to the birds and beasts? Imagine, if you can, what a strangely dull world this would be were there in it no dogs, nor horses, nor birds, nor butterflies! The poets—those who interpret for us, and make articulate the thoughts of many minds—draw much of their inspiration from the joy that comes to them through the humblest of God's creatures. Even the little field-mouse can furnish a theme for an exquisite poem, if a Robert Burns do but spy it! Old Chaucer, we know, loved the "fowls" that sing; one of Shelley's most perfect lyrics was suggested by the skylark; and Wordsworth's cup of joy seemed full when he could lie on the heath and listen to the cry of the cuckoo, or when he watched "the young lambs bound, as to the tabor's sound."

But it is the story of "the birds of Killingworth" (see Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn") that I want to tell you now. Over a hundred years ago, in a Western land, the genial spring had again come round, bringing with it the bursting leaf, and the rushing of the once ice-bound stream, the chirp of the sparrow, the pipe of the blue-bird, and also (ominous sound to the farmers!) the cawing of the crow. In the eyes of the thrifty owners of the soil the birds seemed but pilfering marauders, whose utter extermination would be an unmixed blessing to the world. They could not bear that the least fragment of the reward of their toil should be snatched from their hands; and, in order that they might prevent such a possibility, they agreed to call a town's meeting, and to invite all the leading people to attend it. The squire, who felt himself to be the very essence of society's cream; the parson, whose delights were to preach the wrath of God, and to slay the deer; the deacon, a sort of incarnation of wisdom; and the various farmers of the district came together in state, bent upon bringing the most serious charges against the birds. One after another they arose to denounce in severe tones and with fierce words the evil doings of the feathered tribes. One other there was, however, among the crowd, the master of the academy, who, having learnt that "the greatest thing in the world" is love (a love that shall include the weak and the small, as well as the great and strong), rose up to speak out his thoughts in spite of the number of his opponents. He bade the farmers think no more of slaying the gay "musicians" of the heavens, who, by their melodies, make glad the hearts of men; even as David, by the soothing strains of his harp, cheered the drooping spirit of King Saul. He conjured them to think of the sad desolation of their fields and orchards were these bereft of the little choristers; whose empty nests, clinging to the branches, would but serve to remind the passers-by of their loss. He asked his audience whether they had ever tried to understand how wonderful a creature a bird is, the sweetness of whose song no instrument of man's can match; and warned them that mischief would follow if these little creatures were put to death. For even the black-coated crow was of the utmost value to man, since it captured whole armies of beetles, slugs and snails, and preserved the fruits of the earth from a hundred foes. Finally, he reminded them of the effect which this "slaughter of the innocents" would have upon the tender minds of the children, to whom he—their master—tried to teach the love of all beauteous things. But the good teacher pleaded in vain; for already, in his listeners' minds, the heavenly minstrels were doomed. Too soon the "St. Bartholomew of Birds" began, and ere long the orchards and the fields were silent as the grave. No blithe, winged creatures flitted from tree to tree, warbling sweet snatches of melody; no more might the parent-birds be seen to train, with anxious care, the flight of their young brood; no more the merry, bright-eyed robin followed the plough as it traced the furrows and turned up the worms. The work of destruction was complete!

But at least the farmers needed no longer to fear the loss of their corn, or cherries, or plums! The feathered thieves would not now despoil them of their harvest; the reward of their toil would indeed be all their own!

Scarcely, however, had they time to congratulate themselves upon their success ere a new enemy appeared. Though the airy pilferers stole not of the fruit, the caterpillars hesitated not to devour it. Myriads of them appeared; and speedily ate up every green thing, so that the land became like "a desert without leaf or shade." From the trees the crawling insects dropped upon the shawls and bonnets of the women; and of one theme alone could the townspeople talk—it was of the canker-worm! At last it became plain that a huge blunder had been made, and now the mischief must (if possible) be undone. A "wet sponge" must be drawn "across the accusing slate," that it might no more reveal the dreadful secret! Man and bird were once again to live in harmony together, and the past was to be forgotten! Ah! but the suffering which had been so needlessly caused could not be wiped out; the young creatures which had been left to die of hunger could not be recalled to life, nor revel in the joyous sunshine as before. And, worse still, the farmers and townsfolk had themselves become less gentle and tender-hearted through having turned a deaf ear to the plea for mercy towards the most inoffensive and beautiful of all created things.

But, when the spring once again came round, by the order of the town a number of birds were brought in wicker cages from distant parts, to re-people the groves and make gay with singing the woods and lanes. The children were never weary of talking about their newly-found source of joy; while their mothers declared that most of their neighbours only valued their privileges when these were lost. Others, again, made bold to say that the men might have known that nothing but harm could come from the "slaughter of the Innocents!"

LONDON, MAY 17, 1902.

THE ROCK OF OUR STRENGTH.

WHITSUNTIDE, "the festival of gladness," comes to us always in the midst of a world re-born to beautiful new life, with the promise of the early spring maturing, the victory of life over death, taking hold of our hearts, lifting us up to a new sense of the Divine presence, with calm and thankful trust in the Eternal Spirit, the Giver of all good, the Quickener of our deeper life. That which comes to us in the ordered season of the year, in the land we love, is symbol of the greater gifts of the inward life, and the joy of this time means with us a calm resting in the assurance of the unseen things which are eternal, an earnest reaching forward towards a fuller measure of that life which is ours as children of the living GOD, a reverent and humble waiting for fresh gifts of the Spirit.

This year we find our joy blending with the hope of peace at last from the war which has so sorely tried the faith of many hearts, and, amid the problems of our national life, with the strenuous determination to bear its burdens, to hold fast to those things which alone make the true honour and greatness of a nation. In our own religious community the festival brings back happy memories of the great gatherings of last year, the fresh inspiration which came to us in the concord of Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers from many lands, united in the one spirit of brotherly love, and loyalty to truth, and faithful service of the higher life; and we may well rejoice to meet again upon the same ground, though without the welcome presence of our international guests, for the anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and other societies which serve to strengthen and direct our common work. The programme of the coming week affords good hope that it will be for us a time of real refreshment, for the quickening of our faith and the strengthening of our hands in the great work to which we are called.

But then, in the midst of such thoughts, come these messages of dire catastrophe from the West Indies, volcanic eruptions more awful than any within living memory, St. Pierre in Martinique, a city of 30,000 people, swept by a sheet of flame and poisonous vapour and a storm of glowing ashes belched forth from the great mountain, and every living thing destroyed in one agonising moment; and the destruction from another eruption in St. Vincent only less dreadful in comparison with this appalling tragedy. Here are things which we must reckon with in our time of rejoicing, of brotherly fellowship and quiet, happy work. There are, indeed, other thoughts which come in—of human heroism in the midst of that lurid inferno of destruction, of the instant spring of sympathy and compassion for overwhelming suffering, hastening with help from every side; yet we cannot escape from the one dreadful thought of mortal anguish, the very foundations of the earth seeming to be broken up, and nothing but death on every side!

Then we ask, do we take life on these conditions? What should we have done, if we had been there? That is the test of our manhood, and of our faith. Those thirty thousand were swept away in one awful moment; but other thirty thousands pass constantly by the same way, some peacefully, some in mortal agony; and we know that there is something more than death. We must indeed stand in silent awe before this one great act of GOD, and with unspeakable sympathy for those whom this tragedy touches with personal bereavement and sorrow; yet we have made our peace with death—and this may well make us ask, Where is the rock of our strength? Not in the solid foundations of Mother Earth, for these may be broken up; not amid her lovely scenes, dear as they are to us—and her dreadful forces on their resistless way cannot make those other gifts less beautiful and precious; not in any outward thing, but in the confidence of the living soul, which rests amid mortal life or death in the strength and faithfulness of the Eternal. Faith cannot be staggered by this awful doom, because life rises up in triumph out of the horror, and will face worse than this, to hold fast to truth and righteousness and love, in the life of the spirit free and strong because not of the earth, earthy, but the gift of the living GOD.

We are brought, therefore, not to despair, but to very earnest thoughts, and to the prayer that our manhood may be nurtured in the true strength, and that out of our religious fellowship may grow a new wisdom and a new spirit of courage and helpfulness, to meet even the direst need.

Looking thus to the opportunities and the duty of our churches, we ask those especially who feel that they are in any way touched by the problems of life in London to carefully consider our report of the annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission. It may seem strange to connect in any way the tragedy of life in the poorest quarters of our great city with the thought of this West Indian catastrophe. Yet at the meeting of the Domestic Mission Mr. SMITH OSLER spoke a wise word of warning when he reminded his hearers how we have been apt to be astonished that any Christian people could think it possible to enjoy the bliss of heaven in presence of the endless miseries of hell, while for ourselves we may have been content to enjoy the good gifts of our prosperous and happy life, without a thought of what our less fortunate brothers had to suffer, or with only an idle thought, and no hand stretched out to help. We are appalled at the destruction of St. Pierre; ought we to feel less keenly the slow wasting away of life under dreary and often tragic conditions among the thousands in our slums? Our faith surely is an idle sentiment, and our brotherly love must be a mere pretence, if we are not putting our whole strength into the effort to redeem our city life from these dark blots. We ask that the reports of the missionaries may be read, and that the appeals of the speeches, published in our present issue, may be considered. The minister of the Blackfriars Mission asked specifically last week for more helpers in the work of provident visiting, a work of which Mr. Gow also spoke on Wednesday evening. In this whole work Blackfriars and Mansford-street are with the three other Missions, and they are all rightly made a charge on the faithfulness and devotion of our London churches.

We add here the conclusion of the annual report of the London Domestic Mission :—

In conclusion your Committee would once more earnestly commend the three Missions to the warm and generous help of the friends and supporters of Liberal Christianity in London and the country generally. They furnish a unique opportunity for the practical application of the principles of pure spiritual religion, and the success which has hitherto attended them is, in itself, sufficient refutation of the charge repeatedly made, that without the peculiar doctrines of the orthodox bodies it is impossible to touch the poorer classes of the community. Strenuous and determined efforts are now being made on every side to improve the social condition of the wage-earners in our great cities. Yet there ever remains the task of training the men and women who shall be capable of benefiting by the changed environment which zealous reformers are anxious to bring about. "There is no political alchemy," says a great teacher, "by which you can get golden conduct out of leaden instincts." The method of external amelioration deals, in short, with but one half of the social problem, and it is vain to expect that it will of itself accomplish the end we all desire to see. The most favourable material organisation may become the cause of the wreck of character and of the weakening of will, unless the higher life of the individuals be awakened, and the feeling of personal responsibility be aroused. Quietly and persistently your missionaries are addressing themselves to this task, and in urging the claims of the Society to a larger and more widespread support, the Committee have no other object than to further and strengthen the missionaries in their devoted and self-sacrificing labours.

Be it noted that what they need is not only money, although that is essential, but the help of personal service, of which many kinds are open to those who have patience, perseverance, and goodwill. Out of such work will arise a new confidence of faith, and gladness of spirit, which will react again and bring forth fresh energy of service, to overcome evil with good and build up the veritable kingdom of God.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE sixty-seventh annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission was held on Wednesday evening at the Portland Schools, Little Titchfield-street, the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., of Leeds, in the chair, supported by Mr. P. M. Martineau, chairman of committee, and the Rev. Dr. G. Dawes Hicks, hon. secretary. There was a good attendance of friends and supporters of the Mission, but unfortunately the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, of the Bell-street Mission, was not well enough to attend, and the Rev. J. C. Street, who was to have been one of the speakers, was prevented at the last moment from being present.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, called upon the treasurer, Mr. Philip Roscoe, to present his statement of accounts, and the Committee's Report was read by Dr. Hicks. The accounts showed that the expenses of the three mission stations at George's-row, St. Luke's, Rhyl-street, Kentish Town, and Bell-street, Marylebone, amounted altogether to £1,245, and that the receipts included subscriptions £670 4s. 3d., Donations £336, a special "In Memoriam" donation £100, and collections £104 0s. 5d., £1,210 13s. in all, and a total, including £320 proceeds of sale of Consols and other small receipts, of £1,600 19s. The total expenses were £1,245 2s. 6d., leaving a balance in hand of £211 2s. 1d.; but the treasurer drew attention to a paragraph in the report which pointed out that this balance was only due to the sale of £320 formerly invested as capital, and there was really a deficit of £108 17s. 11d.; and that the committee had determined to repurchase the stock which had been sold, so that really a largely-increased income was required.

The treasurer's last appeal had brought an additional income of £135 from old subscribers, and £106 from new subscribers, but in the present year the death of thirteen old subscribers had meant a loss of £50 to the income, so that to save the Society from constantly-recurring anxiety the committee asked for an additional income of £300 a year.

The Committee's Report recorded another year of useful and successful work, but laid stress on the need of more personal help, both in the Sunday-schools and in the conduct of the various institutions attached to the three mission stations. Among the new departures of work recorded was a physical exercise class for young women, and another for girls under fifteen at George's-row, the weekly attendance of a poor man's lawyer, and a Woman's League, formed at Bell-street after a course of lectures on the training of children, and a Young Women's Club, started by Mrs. Wilson at Rhyl-street. The committee gratefully acknowledged a donation of £55 from Mr. J. H. Leigh, being the whole proceeds of a dramatic entertainment given by him in St. George's Hall last December in aid of the Mission funds. The loss by death of old supporters was sorrowfully recorded, the roll including the names of Mr. P. W. Clayden, Mrs. Dobson, Miss C. A. Martineau, Mr. F. R. Parker, Mrs. H. Sharpe, Miss Durning Smith, and Mr. W. Rathbone, Miss M. E. Martineau, who to the last had been a teacher at Bell-street, Mr. G. L. Bristow, for some time a member of the committee, and Mr. F. S. Schwann, to whose long services on the committee grateful testimony was borne.

Detailed reports of the work at the three missions by the Rev. F. Summers, of George's-row, the Rev. W. Wilson, of Rhyl-street, and the Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, of Bell-street, are printed with the Committee's Report, and will be found of great interest and value.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and balance sheet, expressed his great admiration for the work of the missionaries, and said that reports so interesting, intelligent, sympathetic, and courageous as theirs he had never read. He had intended beforehand to glance at the reports, but he had read every word, and more than once he found the tears coming into his eyes. Their missionaries might well be appalled at the aspect of their work, the mass of poverty and sordid misery was so great, and though a little good might be accomplished here and there, the evil did not seem to grow less. They must be thankful that their men had courage to go on. He was no pessimist. He believed the condition of the poor in their cities was better than it was a hundred years ago, and better than fifty years ago; and yet, again, it seemed to be worse, because London had grown to such vast proportions that the poor were utterly cut off from the country and lost in the wilderness of squalid houses. One of the missionaries commended to them the study of those great city problems, which it was the sin of wealthy society to pass by with shut eyes, and the sin of good people not to face because they are so painful. There were two great problems which must be faced. The first was the problem of housing, for there could be no true spiritual life where a wholesome animal life was impossible. The second was the problem of the unemployed, which was always with them, and in a year's time would have become very acute. What could be more painful than to see, as they did, young men, strong, healthy, and willing, idle not because they were lazy, but because no man would hire them. Their society, he observed, was engaged in three principal pursuits: charity, most wisely administered, on which he warmly congratulated them; the instruction and amusement of the poor, and what better work could there be than to bring a little of the brightness of their own lives to the people of the slums, and give them a little amusement to ease the burden of their lot? and lastly, religion—to make the people feel that they had relations not only with the seen but the unseen, and that the unseen was as near to them as the seen. Such was the great and divine work of their missionaries, and there was none higher in which a man could engage. He urged that the missionaries be supported with all their hearts and all their resources.

Mr. T. SMITH OSLER seconded the resolution. He said that those of their way of thinking were apt to be amazed because others seemed to think it possible to enjoy the blessedness of heaven while the torments of hell were being endured. But ought it to be possible for them, who were prosperous, who lived in the midst of all that made life pleasant, to be unmindful of the poor who in their present condition could enjoy none of those things? The least they could do was to give ample support to their missions. The financial difficulty arose, he thought, partly from the want of local patriotism to sustain them. In a provincial town there was a solidarity which made the whole community feel responsible for their poor, but that was not found in London. Yet from a long experience he was thankful to be assured that that feeling was increasing in their midst.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The Rev. HENRY GOW moved a resolution of confidence in the principles of the Society and appreciation of the missionaries' work.

The reports, he said, recalled to him old memories, and he was again impressed by the greatness of the work. He had been struck by the modesty, the reticence of the missionaries' reports. They could not speak of their deepest work, and yet it was evident from what was recorded that it was done. There was nothing roseate in the reports; the missionaries clearly felt the overwhelming difficulty of their task, but stronger still was their idealism, their faith in God and man. It was something to have ideals, Mr. Summers said, at the beginning of his report, "for in such labour as this it is only out of high endeavours and lofty hopes that dreams can ever become realities." And if Mr. Gray appeared to say just the opposite, it was not really so. "In the actual detailed working of the Mission," he said, "it seems necessary to shut our eyes to the ideal, if we would keep our sanity. In other words, we can only work with immediate efficiency on the lines of philanthropy, while we work in the dark." He felt the truth of that, for if ever a gleam of real beauty and rightness fell upon the slums, it was maddening to think how impossible it was of attainment amid the actual conditions, and they could only go on working at the things nearest to their hand. It recalled to him the old saying, "Thy word is a lamp to my feet." So the true missionary worked in the dark, with the light just in front of his feet. True to his ideals, he believed that by touching a life here and there, though no result could be seen, still there was result. "How is the working-man to be raised," Mr. Wilson asked, "unless individually by another man more highly developed than himself coming into touch with him, and extending to him the hand of brotherhood?" That was the foundation of all their work, as it had been maintained from the first by Dr. Tuckerman and by Mr. Thom, who, under his inspiration, had been the founder of domestic mission work in Liverpool. The individual man coming into touch with another, comradeship, sympathy, love—such was their foundation, and it was the essence of Christianity. Thus visiting in the homes of the people was the essential thing, and all other activities grew up naturally around this, but could never take its place. That work of visiting in the homes of the poor, the sick, and the sinful, even busy people ought to be able to help in. Not every man was fitted to take a boys' club or to teach in Sunday-school; but many more could take up visiting on the lines of provident society work. Any man could undertake to call upon six, eight or a dozen families week by week, with the provident book, simply to collect their pence, and so would find a natural entry into the house without condescension or interference and might be sure of a welcome, and would be brought into close relations of friendship with the people. In Liverpool and Birmingham that work was largely done, and there was the opportunity waiting in London for thousands to take it up, and it contained the secret of the best influence. Mr. Masterman, in a noble paper at the beginning of a book he had just been reading, "The Heart of the Empire," had pointed to the fact that Society had grown tired of slumming, the romance of which was gone, and that even the interest in the University settlements was not so keen as formerly; and he added that the churches, after all, presented the most hopeful machinery for the warfare against poverty and vice, and the dreary monotony of life in the city. It remained for the churches to humanise and Christianise the masses. Such was their opportunity, and in moving that vote of thanks to the missionaries he said they could best fulfil it by giving not only money but more and more of personal service in that great work which was put into their hands to do.

The Rev. F. H. JONES, in seconding the motion, said that he felt genuine gratitude to the missionaries for their work among the people. He was constantly impressed by the fact that the working people are the people. It is they who do the work. They lay the foundation of the whole of our life, whatever we do is built upon that. They provide the material things. They make our roads, build our houses, drive our trains, make everything we have. There was a saying of Paul's, "I laid a foundation; and another buildeth thereon." So they lay the foundation and we build on it, gold, silver, precious stones, or hay or stubble (some of us)! And what have we done in return for all their work? We send our missionaries to help them also to build something on that foundation, that they may have not merely the foundation, but have some gold and precious stones in their lives. And after all something was done, and the lives of the people were not all filthy and hopeless. There were many wholesome, happy lives among the poor and a large amount of goodness; and to many of the people their missions were centres of brightness and help. They often saw a rich man with the splendour of his wealth, and wondered whether he was any the better for it; but they saw a little home in the slums and a little row of flowers in the window, which had come from the Mission and were being lovingly cared for there, and they knew that the people were the better for it. It was not all depression in their work, there was light and joy when they saw what was being done, and they were grateful to their missionaries for it.

The resolution having been cordially passed, Mr. SUMMERS and Mr. WILSON responded, giving interesting particulars of their work. Mr. Summers said that their missions were needed now more than ever. In his own district the former inhabitants, who had been uplifted by the Mission had moved out to other neighbourhoods, and their places had been taken by new-comers less educated, caring less for the higher things of life, and so their work was more difficult and more needed than ever. Mr. Wilson said that he felt that visiting in the homes of the people was his great work, for what they needed most of all was not money, but sympathy and kindness.

On the motion of Mr. F. WITHALL, seconded by Mr. H. J. EVELEGH, the committee and officers were appointed; and a vote of thanks to Mr. Hargrove for presiding, moved by Mr. P. M. MARTINEAU and seconded by Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, brought the meeting to a close.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me a few lines to return thanks for the suggestions and criticisms made both in your paper and in private upon my article on the Lord's Prayer, and to offer a few words of response to some of them.

Mr. Solly, in his friendly and interesting letter, says that "After the death of Jesus, the movement started by John seems to have rapidly dwindled and died," and he doubts "if there ever was a time during the period when the Gospels were taking shape, when the disciples of Jesus were anxious to be put on a level with the disciples of John." He may be right, but the question is not easily decided, and there seems good reason for supposing that from the Jewish point of view the movement of Jesus never did put itself on a level with that of John. Josephus, writing more than sixty years afterwards, tells us nearly as much of John and his movement as the Gospels do, but apparently he makes no reference to Jesus and his disciples, unless the clearly forged passage in the version we possess has some authentic substratum. Even then his reference seems to imply that they are "rapidly dwindling and dying," to use Mr. Solly's words, for he loftily remarks that the "tribe of Christians" is "not yet extinct." Is it not possible that our contempt for John's movement after his death arises from a similar cause to Josephus's contempt for the Christians—namely, lack of information? At all events there is something unexplained in the fact that some thirty years after John's death a man of Apollos's learning is found preaching at Ephesus, and "knowing only the baptism of John." We are compelled to ask ourselves was he literally preaching "τὰ περὶ τοῦ ἰησοῦ" the things about Jesus, because if he knew of Jesus and his movement where did he get his knowledge from, "knowing only the baptism of John"? Certainly not from the Pentecostal movement of the older disciples, and equally certainly not from Paul, whom he has not yet met. Is it not just possible that Pauline Christians, who "no more" knew "Christ after the flesh," should describe any teaching which discerned the inadequacy of the Mosaic dispensation (as John's disciples certainly did) as being "τὰ περὶ τοῦ κυρίου."

This much is certain, that Jesus himself, when worst pressed by his enemies in Jerusalem, fell back upon John's movement as something recognised in some sense even by the priests, "for all held John to be verily a prophet." One might even speculate upon what would have been the course of history if Apollos had remained the only apostle of the Gentiles. May it not be that as Jesus himself was deeply indebted to John, so the early disciples learnt much from the parent movement before the latter "dwindled and died," and that the slow majestic growth of Christianity will always retain some traces of the great upheaval which broke the ground and even sheltered its first beginnings?

But to turn to the Lord's Prayer itself. Two questions of very different degrees of importance must be distinguished. It is comparatively unimportant whether we have or have not in the Lord's Prayer an authentic utterance of Jesus himself, whereas it is of vital importance for us to decide whether we find in either version the highest and purest expression of his teachings as to prayer.

For with regard to the former question we are all agreed to confine our differences between two extreme points. We all agree (a) that the Prayer is Jewish in its thought and ideal and phrasing, and can be largely paralleled in contemporary Jewish devotion; and (b) that, on the other hand, it bears the unmistakable impress of the influence of the Nazarene's genius. Let me take two examples only to prove this latter point. The wordy laudations with which it was customary to address the Deity amongst Jesus's contemporaries are most characteristically reduced to the sublime simplicity of the Luke version's "Father." Even more striking and more conspicuously characteristic of Jesus's individual genius is the petition as to forgiveness, In the reference to the Prayer of Gamaliel II., for which I have to thank Mr. Voysey, I am unable to find substantiation for his statement that "the greater and more important part of the Lord's Prayer was in use in Jewish synagogues fifty years before Jesus was born." But it furnishes this really sublime contrast between the Jewish and Christian prayers. In the Jewish prayer the petition for forgiveness (the only one that compares at all nearly with anything in the Lord's Prayer), God is asked to forgive on the strength of His own forgiving nature. Whereas in the Christian prayer the great truth is realised that it is not God's state of mind we have to modify or invoke, but our own; and it is no longer "forgive us because Thou art forgiving," but "forgive us for we ourselves are forgiving." This bears the unmistakable stamp of Jesus's perpetual thought that the Divine Spirit is invoked not by words or laudations, but by the active energies of our own spirits.

Many would wish me to add to these two samples the remarkable insight which is shown in the selection of Luke's five short petitions from the vast mass of current Jewish devotion. But though this certainly displays genius of a high order, I cannot think that in itself it proves that Jesus was its compiler. An age which could reduce the Law and the Prophets to the two great commandments which, if we are to believe St. Luke's account, appear to have been current before the parable of the good Samaritan, may surely have been capable of producing the Lord's Prayer under the stimulation of Jesus's influence, and historians know that we must perpetually guard ourselves against the tendency to attribute every remarkable deed or word of any age to its greatest figure, irrespective of external and internal evidence.

And coming to the more important question, I am still obliged to think that internal evidence from the character of Jesus's highest devotional utterances compels us, I will not say to reject the authenticity of the Lord's Prayer, but at all events to interpret its real meaning by passages where all forms are superseded in words dropping hot from the spirit, coined by the immediate pressure of spiritual exigencies. To myself I confess that the Lord's Prayer, not so interpreted, is almost as inferior to the highest teaching of Jesus as it is superior to its alleged Jewish precursors. If Jesus himself uttered it, I cannot but regard it as a concession to his disciples' lack of spiritual inspiration; and though we in our weakness may often be grateful to the occasion which has given it to us, yet in our stronger, growing moments we must still turn to no form which has ever attempted to provide access to God in an arrangement of words or to prepare our souls by verbal exercises, but rather to the spirit revealed throughout the whole life and teaching of the mighty Israelite who, like his mythical forefather, found life in wrestling with God for a blessing.

MINISTER AND CHURCH COMMITTEE.

SIR,—As the question whether the minister should or should not be a member of the Church Committee is being considered in your columns, perhaps you will allow me, as for many years a member, and for eight the hon. secretary, of one of our churches, to express my emphatic opinion that it is very inexpedient for the minister to occupy a seat on the committee. In such cases it would almost be a slight not to vote him to the chair; but then it is almost impossible for the committee to act independently, and the minister becomes the master, and not the leader, of the congregation. Indeed, it has come to my knowledge that a minister who had become accustomed to take the chair actually took it at a general meeting of the congregation specially convened to consider whether or not his resignation should be accepted!

ARMYTAGE BAKEWELL.

RELIGION V. THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

SIR,—I hope you can find space for some remarks on Miss Cobbe's admirable and valuable letter published by you on May 3, before it is forgotten. I fear that she thinks too well of us, and that discussion of our Christology is still necessary, for it is a subject on which Unitarian opinion is not only various but vague. I would suggest that we should all put to ourselves a few questions as a help to clearing this vagueness; not that uniformity is in the least degree to be wished for, but that it is good to know the drift of opinion, and still more important for each individual to gain clearness. Without clearness useful teaching, we must acknowledge, is impossible, and honest action difficult.

As one test I would ask how many of us attach a distinct meaning to the phrase in the leading article on Miss Cobbe's letter about being "with Jesus as a living friend in the Divine presence"; and, farther, which of us would claim such an experience as the sole mode of being perfected in the knowledge of various great religious truths?

Another test; if we read through Bowring's well-known hymn "In the Cross of Christ I glory," how many of us can adopt the words as true of our experience?

I will say no more, but that to those who take the affirmative side in these tests Miss Cobbe's appeal is useless; to some of us it is a call to be true in word to our real beliefs, and not to allow our minds to be smothered by "comfortable words" or by a concession to what she well calls a "familiar weakness of human nature." GOD'S SACRIFICE.

SIR,—I have no desire to pursue this matter further. I did not set out to convert Mr. Pike, but to answer his inquiry. That I have done, to the best of my ability, and I am content to leave the question to the consideration of your readers. I have already received very welcome assurances that what I have written has proved helpful. In conclusion, I would thank you for giving the extract from Dr. Martineau's sermon, thus rescuing the "stilted formula" from the injustice of a too brief quotation.

HUNGARIAN CORRESPONDENCE.

MANY readers of THE INQUIRER will hear, I hope, with pleasure of Mr. Shrubsole, our zealous friend who spent several days at Budapest and at Kolozsvár just lately. In both places I had the pleasure of being his guide. Mr. Shrubsole kindly gave two lectures at Kolozsvár to the theological students on the Sol-fa system of singing. He enjoyed it, seeing that the students pick it up very quickly. I hope this very practical mode of teaching classes will be appreciated and soon appropriated in Hungary.

Mr. Shrubsole is engaged in a very important business-like undertaking of bringing England and Hungary into a close union by establishing in Hungary English mills for cotton and woollen manufacture. I had the pleasure of pointing out to him last September, when he was here with other friends, what a good field there is here for English capitalists in several directions, since Hungary is mostly an agricultural country where raw material is produced in great abundance, but has to be carried into foreign countries in order to be worked up to suit modern need and taste.

During his travels he convinced himself that some good can be done, and opened a very extensive correspondence. Your correspondent and a lawyer friend of his, Dr. J. Weis, Vice-President of the Bureau of Lawyers, as well as others, gave him great assistance in securing full particulars in every direction. Mr. Shrubsole, with the help of some of his English friends who are experts in cotton and woollen manufacture, began to study the question. They advised him to come and settle the more important things here with the Government and with others. I am glad to say the Government secured, for the mills to be erected, such a subvention for ten years as will enable them, even under unfavourable circumstances, to work with a very considerable profit. Considering that the remission of taxation, stamp duties, country and municipal rates and taxes for fifteen years are granted, the reduction for all railway rates for raw materials and manufactured goods is secured, besides considering the very great demand for all kinds of textile products, it is quite evident that a better chance for capitalists can hardly be opened. But I must add yet one more thing. At Koloszvár, where woollen-mills are proposed to be erected, the municipality granted land of about fifty-four acres entirely free, with several other advantages which greatly concur to make this undertaking profitable.

I need not go into further details since Mr. Shrubsole, who is to return soon, will give all information needed. I only wished to call the attention of the readers of THE INQUIRER to this very important movement. As regards Hungary I expect an immeasurable good out of it. England or English capitalists cannot possibly lose, and as a good result for both countries it may be taken for granted that Hungary and England will become good friends.

Wishing you all success for the coming annual meetings,—I remain yours truly,

GEO. BOROS.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Western Union was held at Bath, on Thursday, May 8, the churches of the district being well represented.

At noon service was held in Trim-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. G. V. Crook, the preacher being the Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS, M.A., of Oxford. Taking for text the last words of the Book of Daniel, "Thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days," he spoke of the true meaning of religious assurance, which, he said, ought to mean that quiet joy of trustfulness which breathed, perhaps, nowhere so purely and simply as in Miss Waring's familiar hymns, that found itself strengthened by daily obedience, and found the Kingdom of Heaven just where its lot was cast and the daily task prepared, and loved to have it so. It was an assurance not only that God was going to be their Judge, but that God was their Judge daily and hourly. They endeavoured to do their duty, and a little more, thinking all good things, and stretching out the hand to others; but the sameness wore them down sometimes, and the dull, hard highway did not seem very much like their true original course, when all at once a duty came to them just because they were in the way of their duty, and they learned the blessing of those who did what they could: they knew for once they were just where God meant them to be. That thought he would apply to the work of ministers in their churches. They were shut out from fellowship with those of the popular churches, and their work often seemed lonely and monotonous. It had been said to him there was a line drawn in which Christian ministers might co-operate, and that Unitarian ministers were just below that line. If that were so it marked out also a very considerable portion of this present world, and there lay their work. If their station was in the long field there was plenty to be done in that lond field. His sympathy was indeed with all those in that dear West country who were often at outposts where it seemed that little could be done, and where they kept watch and ward among a faithful few. It had never struck them, perchance, that the world in which they lived had need of them, and that there was that before them which they could do and nobody else could.

THE LUNCHEON.

After service a luncheon was held at the Assembly Rooms, the Rev. J. McDowell presiding, and among those present were the Mayor (Mr. E. E. Phillips), and the ex-Mayor (Mr. T. B. Silcock), of Bath. The loyal toasts were duly honoured, after which Mr. W. Colfox proposed the sentiment of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the world over." He recollected, he said, the rejoicings over the passing of the Reform Bill, and thought that if that sentiment did not rouse the same feeling now, it was because so much had been gained and they had little fear of the future.

The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, who responded, having referred to his old associations with Bath, said that they were at the present day brought to think that the victory was not always to the cocksure, and that it was not always the fighter who determined the future, because the line of progress was in the line of resultant forces. That was the very reason why even when they did not think their protest or appeal was going to determine exactly the future, they knew it was going to be an ingredient in the determining of the future. It was going to be an element in the result. In the direction of civil and religious liberty they had to consider what had been growing up within those last forty years all over the country. They had a civic temper which had been generated by the co-operation of men of divergent views with equal devotion and assiduity for worthy public objects. There had been an extraordinary revival of activity in their municipal corporations; there had been the educational administration which the School Boards had spread all over the country; they saw men meeting on the County Councils on a common ground, and discovering the usefulness and ability of those whom they were perhaps surprised to see entrusted with a great public responsibility. All this was distinctly a triumph for civil liberty. They could not, except in a chord very much at the back of their minds, think that because a man working with them for good things—for sanitation, social purity, the welfare of the young, or higher education—although inspired by a spirit of beneficence and patriotism, happened to differ from them in creed, he had no place in the counsels of God and no place in the eternal future. The great lesson of religious liberty had been taught in that country, and if people thought that the pulpit-drum ecclesiastic could play the old tunes any more he was sure they would be entirely mistaken. He would only remark on the new Education Bill, speaking as a practical old educationalist, that the great gap in their national education system which had been a great injustice to them for years, was in regard to the training colleges; they must have national and denominational training colleges. In conclusion, he showed how among the Unitarians themselves the spirit of religious liberty had grown during the past sixty years. Differences of operations and of views, divergencies of speculation were, he believed, far more rife among them than they were sixty years ago, but the recognition of the one spirit, of the common service, was more heartfelt, more close and more general amongst them than it ever had been.

The Rev. Jeffrey Worthington proposed "The Sister Churches of all denominations," to which the Ex-Mayor (Mr. Silcock) responded, saying that he always remembered how much the denomination to which he belonged and the whole Christian Church owed to the Unitarian branch of the Church. Nobody could forget how much the whole Church owed to the late Dr. Martineau, who in a very true way belonged not simply to Unitarianism but to Christ's Church as a whole.

The toast of "The City of Bath," submitted by Mr. P. J. Worsley, was acknowledged by the Mayor, and the proceedings closed with thanks to the Bath community for their hospitality, proposed by Maj.-General Jacob and acknowledged by Mr. J. A. W. Ricketts.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The annual business meeting was held in the chapel in the afternoon. The President, Mr. W. Walker, who occupied the chair, referred to the prevalence of Unitarian thought in other churches, and urged that greater efforts should be made to revive the life in their own churches.

The Rev. A. N. Blatchford presented the report of the committee, which recorded various changes in the ministry during the year. The report was, said Mr. Blatchford, on the whole, bright and interesting, and he had only to regret the absence through illness of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, to whom a large share of the success of the work must be credited.

The report was adopted on the motion of Mr. E. Goodland, seconded by Mr. Baker.

Mr. W. Colfox moved the adoption of a trust deed in connection with the Twentieth Century Fund, whereby a sum of £1,029 had been raised, the income of which is to be devoted to the general expenses of the Union.

Mr. W. Norgrove seconded, and Dr. Blake Odgers having signified his approval of the deed, the resolution was carried, the first trustees being elected as follows:—Mr. P. J. Worsley, Colonel M. Locke Blake, Mr. J. K. Champion, and Mr. T. A. Colfox.

Tribute was paid by Mr. Worsley to Mr. Blatchford's devoted services in connection with the fund.

The officers and committee were then appointed, Mr. E. J. Blake being elected President; and thanks were accorded to the Revs. G. V. Crook and J. E. Odgers for their services, and to Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C, and the Rev. F. W. Stanley, who were present, representing the B. and F.U.A. A resolution on the Education question affirming the need of one authority for a large but not unwieldy area, to be genuinely representative of the people, and protesting against the maintenance of theological tests in rate-supported schools, brought the meeting to a close.

In the evening a public meeting was held, when addresses were given by the President, the Revs. F. W. Stanley and W. Lloyd, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department shoul be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal.

London: Stratford, E.—The teachers of the Sunday-school make their customary appeal for help towards the expense of the scholars' annual summer excursion. Contributions will be thankfully received by Mr. W. J. Noel (treasurer), Briarwood, Grove-hill, South Woodford, Essex; or Mr. George Shute (secretary), 53A, Romford-road, Stratford, Essex.

Chester.—At the close of the service on Sunday evening last, a meeting of the congregation was held for the purpose of considering the Education Bill. The Rev. H. E. Haycock submitted a resolution protesting against the mischievous and reactionary character of the Bill; this was seconded, in the course of a vigorous speech, by Mr. E. Powell, supported by Mr. W. W. Tasker and Miss Montgomery, B.A., and unanimously adopted. Copies were ordered to be sent to the Parliamentary leaders on both sides the House, to the local members of Parliament, and to the Press.

Godalming.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary and spring flower services were held at Mead-row Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Hubert Clarke in the morning, and in the afternoon and evening by the Rev. Frederic Allen, of Stamford-street. At the children's service at 3.30 the chapel was filled, and it was pleasant to see the neighbourliness of the Guildford congregation evidenced by the presence of the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, with some of the scholars and teachers from the Ward-street Church. A special feature of the service was the music, beautifully rendered by the string band, fourteen in number, under the leadership of the minister; the singing was hearty, and the chapel was prettily decorated with wild flowers, which were sent to the Shadwell Hospital. The collections taken were given to the school funds.

Halifax.—On Sunday, May 11, Sunday-school anniversary services were held at Northgate-end Chapel, conducted by the Rev. H. D. Roberts, of Liverpool. In the afternoon a Service of Song on "The Life, Labours, and Sufferings of Oliver Heywood, B.A., of Northowram," was rendered, the reader being Mr. E. B. Stott. On Monday, May 12, the Rev. H. D. Roberts told the story of "The First Sixty Years of English Nonconformity." Collections at the services and at the lecture in aid of the school funds amounted to £26 12s. 5d.

King's Lynn.—On Sunday week, in connection with the settlement of the Rev. J. Pollard as minister, services were conducted by the Rev. J. Harwood, B.A. On the following Monday a tea was held in the schoolroom, which was well attended. At eight o'clock a public meeting was held, when the schoolroom was well filled. Mr. F. A. Bush was in the chair, and on behalf of the congregation welcomed Mr. Pollard to Lynn, and expressed the hope that he might be as successful at Lynn as he was at Kentish Town. The other speakers were the Revs. J. Harwood, B.A., A. Hall, M.A. (Norwich), E. W. Bremner, Congregational minister of Lynn, and J. Pollard. The Rev. E. W.

Bremner, whose attendance was gratifying from the previous aloofness of the Nonconformists in the town, said he was glad to come and welcome a fellow-worker, for however divided they were in some aspects of truth they were united in others. The Revs. J. Harwood, representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and A. Hall, representing the Eastern Union, expressed their best wishes on behalf of their Associations. The Rev. J. Pollard thanked the speakers for their kind words, and said the congregation could rest assured that he would do his best to show himself worthy of their confidence. A programme of music was rendered during the evening, and a vote of thanks to the chairman brought the proceedings to a close.

Leeds: Hunslet.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held here on 11th inst., and were conducted by the Rev. A. C. Fox, B.A., of Glossop. There were good congregations, and the collections were in advance of those of previous years.

London: Lewisham.—A well-attended meeting of the congregation was held last week to consider proposals for more adequately meeting the increasing demands of Lewisham. Notwithstanding the high rental of £70 a year, the congregation, which is not wealthy, has paid all expenses connected with the services since the end of the first eight months, and has met the regular yearly reduction of the grant for the minister's salary. It is felt that the time has arrived for building a permanent church-home, and to this end the members of the congregation are turning with a will to do their best. Anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 11, with fairly large congregations, in the evening the church was well filled. There was a public meeting on Wednesday, the 14th, under the presidency of the Rev. W. Chynoweth Pope, when speeches were made by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, T. E. M. Edwards, and others.

London: Mansford-street Church and Mission (Welcome Meeting).—A meeting of subscribers and friends was held on Thursday, the 8th inst., to welcome the Rev. John and Mrs. Ellis to London. Amongst those present were the following:—Revs. W. G. Tarrant, V. D. Davis. W. Copeland Bowie, Edgar Daplyn, F. Allen, T. E. M. Edwards, Messrs. H. B. Lee, E. F. Grundy, T. Adams, W. Baily, I. Lister, J. B. Wostinholm, Miss L Jones, Miss F. Jones, Miss Norton, Mrs. Baily, and Mrs. Tarrant. Mr. J. Classon Drummond presided, and in his opening remarks referred to the absence of Mr. Preston, who would have been there to take the chair, but was unfortunately unable to leave his bed. At these times, said Mr. Drummond, it was the custom to review the past and say something of the future. The mission was originally started at Spicer-street, where their old friend Mr Corkran worked for so many years. In those days instruction in the three R's was one of the principal items, but the work has now changed. It was no use haranguing against the music-halls unless they could produce better places, and they had got such another place at Mansford-street. They must try to do more of the social work, as in this lay the solution of the East London problem. He would like to see the Sunday service made the common meeting-place for a large and enthusiastic congregation, which would be an inspiration for its new minister. He heartily welcomed Mr. and Mrs. Ellis to London in the name of the Hampstead committee. Mr. Alfred Thompson then spoke on behalf of the school and congregation. Mr. J. B. Wostinholm, a member of Mr. Ellis's late congregation at Upperthorpe, also added a few cordial words; and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant welcomed Mr. Ellis on behalf of the ministers of London. In coming among them Mr. Ellis would be following in a goodly line. To march under the flag which had known such veterans as Theo. Lindsey, Dr. Price, Dr. Sadler, Dr. Herford, Philip Wicksteed, and Dr. Martineau, was not small honour. Mr. Tarrant added some genial words of advice to minister and congregation. Mr. Ellis, in replying for himself and his wife, said his friends had been much surprised to hear of his leaving Sheffield for Mansford-street, leaving the pleasant and cheerful surroundings and a devoted people for the difficult work and monotonous environment of an East London Mission. He would tell them how it was. He was deeply interested in the social problem. Human life was very beautiful and interesting, and if he could bring some light into the lives of those around them he would be happy. The work of a domestic mission was humble, but it was the noblest and holiest work in which a man could engage. He had been there six weeks, and he thought he was getting on pretty well. He found the Institutions thoroughly well organised, and bore testimony to the evidences of the careful work of his predecessor. There was a healthy young men's club for rational enjoyment, and he hoped in time that the members of it would respond to his appeal to them to cultivate in addition those qualities in themselves which make for good citizenship. Life was not all bagatelle, billiards and ping-pong. There were many other evidences of careful ploughing and sowing, and everything was well organised. Mr. Ellis also spoke of the excellent young women's class under Miss Garrett, and the good work of the Provident Society, all of which he hoped would prosper. He thanked them most heartily for their cordial reception. A short programme of music was gone through during the evening, arranged by Mrs. J. Classon Drummond. The meeting passed a vote of sympathy with Mr. Stanton W. Preston in his illness.

London: Peckham. — On Saturday last a dramatic and musical entertainment was given under the direction of Mr. G. V. Carter, in aid of the funds of the Avondale-road Church. The commodious schoolroom was well filled by an appreciative audience, and the financial result was highly satisfactory. Among other friends who kindly gave their services were Mr. W. H. James (baritone), Mr. Ivor James ('cello), and Mr. S. T. Lock (folk-songs), from the Wandsworth Church.

London: Stamford-street.—The annual inspection of No. 1 Company of the Boys' Own Brigade, members of the Stamford-street Sunday-school and choir, was held on Tuesday, the 13th inst., Sergeant R. Bartram being the inspecting officer. The lads showed good discipline, and gave a highly effective display of their efficiency both in drill and gymnastic exercises, while a lantern march gave great pleasure to the large gathering of friends. The prizes for efficiency and good conduct were presented by Mrs. Allen. The chaplain—the Rev. Frederic Allen—in a short address, gave an account of the formation and objects of the Boys' Own Brigade, mainly as a training in the direction of good citizenship. Mr. Ion Pritchard emphasised this by a few anecdotes illustrative of trustworthiness, and the proceedings were brought to a close by singing the Brigade hymn, "Lend a Hand," repeating the Lord's Prayer and benediction. It is intended that the boys shall camp out this summer for a week, and Captain F. E. Allen made an appeal for assistance in procuring the necessary funds.

Wales.—A successful festival of the combined churches of Aberdare, Cwmbach, Dowlais, Pentre, Clydach Vale, and Cefncoed, was held on Monday last at Cefncoed, where the Wesleyans kindly lent the use of their handsome chapel. There were two sessions, at two and at six, at which Mr. Lewis Noah Williams and Mr. Gomer Thomas respectively presided. The conductor was the Rev. David Evans, Cwmbach, who did his part very well indeed. Mrs. John Lewis, Pontypridd, presided at the organ, and as a new feature we had a small orchestra to accompany. The pastors of our neighbouring churches were all present. The chapel was well filled at both meetings.

I THINK this is the authentic sign and seal
Of Godship, that it ever waxes glad,
And more glad, until gladness blossoms, bursts
Into a rage to suffer for mankind,
And recommence at sorrow: drops like seed
After the blossom, ultimate of all.
Say, does the seed scorn earth and seek the sun?
Surely it has no other end and aim
Than to drop, once more die into the ground,
Taste cold and darkness and oblivion there:
And thence rise, tree-like grow through pain to joy,
More joy and most joy—do man good again.—R. Browning.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, DEVONPORT.

This Congregation is making a great effort to secure the Freehold of their Church, in order to free themselves from a yearly charge of £15 15s. for ground rent. The opportunity of doing so on favourable terms now exists, but on the decease of the present landlord (who is over 70 years of age) it is doubtful whether equally good conditions will be offered. The effort has been approved by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and is warmly supported by the B. and F. Unitarian Association. The sum of £57 has already been raised by the members and their friends, but as the congregation is mainly of the working class, it is impossible to raise the whole sum required (£337) without generous outside help.

The following contributions have already been promised in addition to the £57 already mentioned:—

"THE INQUIRER" PUBLISHING COMPANY.

AT the annual meeting of the shareholders in THE INQUIRER Publishing Company (Limited), held on the 15th inst., a motion proposing to reconsider the resolution of the 10th of March (terminating the engagement of the present Editor, and effecting certain retrenchments in expenditure) was carried by a small majority. The Directors accordingly resigned, and a new Board was elected consisting of Messrs. Russell Scott, John Dendy, and Charles W. Jones, and the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and Henry Gow. The meeting terminated with a hearty and unanimous vote of thanks to Mr. David Martineau and the retiring Board. The very generous letter from these gentlemen, which appears below, will give the new Directors every opportunity of endeavouring still further to improve the character and extend the influence of THE INQUIRER, and these objects they will sedulously pursue.

TO THE SHAREHOLDERS OF THE INQUIRER.

Dear Sir, or Madam,

We beg to inform you that at the annual meeting, held on the 15th inst., the action of the late Directors was, by a small majority, not approved, and a new Board of Directors was elected.

We accept the decision, and will be glad if our supporters will kindly do the same.

We all desire that THE INQUIRER should prosper, and therefore shall abstain, and ask our friends to abstain, from any action which might embarrass the new management

Our successors believe that they will be able, by means of the increased financial support promised, to improve the paper in various ways, and we now, on leaving office, express the wish that their hopes may be fulfilled.

Yours faithfully,

DAVID MARTINEAU.

C. FELLOWS PEARSON.

OUR FESTIVAL OF LIFE.

IT has been for us a good week, rich in the sense of strenuous life, earnest purpose, and cordial fellowship. Memories of last year's greater gatherings have not damped our ardour, or made anything we have attempted now seem little in comparison. Our cause is as great as ever, our ideal appears to us greater and more beautiful for what we enjoyed and realised last year, in the fellowship of the International Council; and to this we may attribute a good part of the strong confidence and gladness which have characterised this week's meetings.

We cannot offer to our readers in a single number the whole abundant store of the wise and helpful and inspiring things that have been said, and in particular we look forward to publishing in subsequent numbers, from week to week, the series of five papers read on Thursday morning on "Types of Religious Experience," papers of direct personal testimony of the highest value, and touching such deep chords of sympathy in those who heard them. Of these testimonies of Anglican, Congregationalist, Methodist, Presbyterian, and Roman Catholic, who had been led each in turn into the freer faith and the new fellowship of Unitarians, the PRESIDENT rightly said that they should make us realise with a fresh vividness the privileges which are ours, and the responsibility laid upon us to make the fellowship of our churches as rich in helpfulness and inspiration as it is possible to be made.

And if there are any who ask sincerely how they may be more true to the cause to which we are pledged, and bring new strength and effectiveness into the life of our churches, we ask them to read and to ponder the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, preached on Wednesday morning by the Rev. HENRY GOW, which we publish in full this week. Let them listen to his appeal for self-forgetfulness and utter loyalty to truth and righteousness, and be assured that GOD has indeed a work for them to do. Let them surrender to the spirit of modesty, and steadfast courage and clear insight which breathes through that sermon, and then turn also to the address by Mrs. ALFRED OSLER on the "Obligations of our Heritage," and attend particularly to her words, towards the close, on the constraining power of a high ideal, and the fresh inspiration that will surely come from whole-hearted loyalty to such an ideal.

These are only a few of the special points of interest and stimulus to which we desire to draw attention, but the whole of the reports will be found such as to give us new courage, and deeper thankfulness than ever for the work to which we are called and the great heritage that is ours.

A MEMORIAL TO MR. P. W. CLAYDEN.

SIR,—Since the death of Mr. P. W. Clayden a widely felt desire has been expressed for some permanent memorial of his strong personality. He is endeared to many by the charm and inspiration of his strenuous character, his life-long battle for civil and religious liberty in all countries and his fearless striving for Truth in matters of faith and Righteousness in public affairs.

Many of the most active years of his life were spent in Nottingham, and his friends in this city feel that his memory may be most fitly perpetuated in the town with which he was intimately associated in religious, social, and political work, and particularly in the High Pavement Chapel, of which he was minister during those years. It is proposed, therefore, that the memorial should take the form of a stained-glass window in the chancel of this chapel. The estimated cost is upwards of £500, and of this sum over £300 has already been promised by members of the congregation.

Mr. Clayden's work and influence extended into so wide a field—literary, social, and political, as well as religious—that it is believed many in various localities and of diverse phases of thought will wish to participate in this tribute. The co-operation of all such will be welcomed by the Committee, in order that the memorial may worthily fulfil its intention. Contributions may be sent to any of the undersigned, or to Lloyd's Bank, Nottingham, through any of their branches :—

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL

RELIGION V. THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

SIR,—To still further continue the subject to which Miss Frances Power Cobbe has called our attention, perhaps the readers of THE INQUIRER may be interested in reading the words to which the revered Charles Wicksteed long ago gave utterance in his lecture entitled "Jesus." He says:—

"I can quite sympathise with and understand the feeling that finds the continual and, as it were, forced introduction of the name of Jesus into our conversation, our prayers, our sermons, actually offensive. I am sure it would have been offensive to himself. (The italics are mine.) We seem actually afraid lest he should be forgotten. We seem as if we dare not trust a single prayer with God, unless Christ were summoned to carry it into His presence. We seem as if we dared not enforce a single righteous principle, or give expression to a single pure emotion of the heart without, as it were, sheltering it under the sanction and protection of Jesus Christ. And yet the Lord's Prayer—in which the name of Christ never occurs, and which is a prayer of pure Theism—is, I suppose, as Christian in its spirit and character as if we uttered the name of Jesus at the end of each clause. No! we have degraded Christ by making him the head of a great sect, with his sectatores, and assentatores—instead of leaving him in his grand reality as a Son of God, and brother of man, knowing no countries, or nations, or religions, but only one wide humanity. This, to me, constitutes his grandeur, his abiding claim to my homage and my gratitude, that he is only committed to world-wide principles, and to the universal religion which rests not only on eternal principles, but on principles which apply to our whole humanity."

And Mr. Wicksteed, we believe, would have fully agreed with Miss Cobbe when she says that our "love and reverence" for Jesus may best be shown by our efforts to live out the lofty teachings of the Sermon on the Mount.

ALICE A. LUCAS.

LIBERAL RELIGION IN ENGLISH PAINTING.

SIR,—My admiration for Hogarth is so great that I am sorry to have said anything of him that should be thought by a brother-admirer of his, like Mr. Dexter, to "border on injustice." In his context Hogarth certainly cannot be described as "fierce, coarse and malignant"; for such was the character of the age, and, as a matter of fact, Hogarth was much milder than some of his contemporary satirists. There is often something gentle and pathetic in the most harrowing of his pictures; whereas Swift and Pope are absolutely unrelieved in their bitterness. He comes between these and Henry Fielding, whose satire, judged by theirs, is even kindly. Yet, when we study his representations of home-life in the light of Millais, Mrs. Allingham and Kate Greenaway, I confess I do not think my words will be considered very severe.

Mr. Orr's letter is perplexing. To disprove what seemed to me the rather obvious statement that "a hundred and fifty years ago we had no landscape," he musters a list of writers which includes three (Goldsmith, Cowper and Falconer) who had not then begun to write, and four more (Burns, Crabbe, Bloomfield and Campbell) who were not even born! Johnson, too, whom I would have thought one of the very last, at any period of his life, to associate with landscape, made his uncomfortable peregrination through the Hebrides as late as 1773. And as I excepted Gray, there only remain Addison, Thomson and Akenside to support the objection.

Now what sort of a landscape do we meet with in their writings?

Addison, who cared for Italy as the country of Horace and Virgil, heartily disliked mountains. After a journey over the Alps in 1701 he wrote:—"My head is still giddy with mountains and precipices, and you can't imagine how much I am pleased with the sight of a plain." In saying this he expressed the polite taste of the time. Evelyn complained of the "hideous rocks" of Fontainebleau, "heaped one on another in mountainous height, that I think the like is nowhere to be found more horrid and solitary," while he spoke with delight of the "accurately-kept and cultivated walks" of Richelieu's villa, and of "a large and very rare grotto of shell-work." Defoe, whose hero, Robinson Crusoe, never shows the slightest interest in the scenery of his island, on visiting the English Lake District in 1722, wrote of "the horrid height and narrowness" of the country round Windermere and Grasmere, and of the "impassable hills," which seemed to tell him that "all the pleasant part of England was at an end."

Thomson had some genuine feeling for the Cheviots, but, as we might expect in that wig and powder period, he clothed it in language that has made the "Seasons" almost unreadable since the work of Wordsworth and Turner. His elegant Latinisms and personifications, the fashionable trick of tripling his nouns and adjectives and clauses, his innumerable far-fetched and unnatural phrases, such as "plumy people," "plastic tubes," "juicy groves," "lucid moisture," "vivid verdure," "rosy-bosomed spring," &c., and the conventional young men and maidens who make love in his fields and groves — Damon, Celadon, Amelia, Amanda, Lucinda, Musidora, and the rest—are enough to destroy our pleasure, except as students of a style, in anything he says.

The same artificial diction, by that time well-worn and wearisome, characterises fatally the work of Akenside. In a pretty passage we read of the consenting zephyr sighing, and the weeping rill joining in the plaint of man's tuneful breast and partaking bosom, of spring unfolding from the silken gem its lucid leaves, and of strains ascending from the tenants of the warbling shade. Dr. Akenside was a frigid, pompous person, whose "Pleasures of the Imagination" are described by Mr. Gosse as "cold," and his "Odes" as "icy cold."

It is interesting that Mr. Orr should not only like this kind of poetry, but even speak of it with enthusiasm. It illustrates, I think, what I have more than once observed, the very slight influence exerted by English and German Romanticism on certain branches of Irish culture. The taste, ideals, and doctrines in vogue in England a hundred and fifty years ago are still faithfully cherished in some Ulster towns and villages.

THE LIGHT.

AN old friend, who found Mr. Harrold Johnson's lines on "The Gleam," taken last week from the Christian Register, hardly satisfying, sent us, with his good wishes for the Whitsuntide meetings, the following lines as an alternative:—

Follow the Light, from heaven the ray,
Which Christ hath shed on Life's rough way!
Follow his Voice which bids you come
To him in his eternal home.
And if thy path be rugged, steep,
God's loving care thy steps will keep,
Till thou shalt reach that blessed shore
Where sin and death are known no more.
If the voice within responds to this,
On Earth is Peace, in Heaven is bliss.

I. M. WADE.

AN Irish minister writes:—"The folfowing appears in the Belfast Northern Whig for May 13:—'University Intelligence. Trinity College. Dr. Downes's prizes for reading the Liturgy, 1st —, 2nd —.' Surely a striking illustration of the too general forgetfuness of what prayer, taking the Liturgy to be a series of prayers, really means! I remember seeing, years ago, a photograph of Bishop Wilberforce, of Oxford then, dressed in his robes of office, crook in one hand, the other hand raised, pronouncing a benediction, it would seem, on the camera. I have heard that a well-known American Evangelist was photographed not long ago 'in the attitude of prayer.' And I am told that a Boston U.S. newspaper described a certain prayer as 'the most eloquent prayer ever addressed to a Boston audience.' And now we have 'prizes for the best reading of the Liturgy.' To-morrow, possibly, we shall have prizes offered for the best extempore prayer. Why not, when we tell about our 'successful' services and anthems 'effectively' rendered? Are we forgetting that worship is homage paid to God and prayer is speech with God?"

WE noted with pleasure before Christmas the announcement that the new volume of Harper would contain a story by Mrs. Humphry Ward, but month after month passed and nothing appeared. Now, however, in the May number, we have the first chapters of "Lady Rose's Daughter," which from its opening promises to be an extremely interesting study of high society life in London. Beginning so late in the year it will, we presume, be a comparatively short story and not a novel of the proportions of "Eleanor" and Mrs. Ward's other chief books. In the current number of Cornhill will be found a stirring account of the military career of the late Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain in India, by Mr. A. I. Shand. The Sunday Magazine, of which the King and the Prince of Wales have accepted copies, contains the first instalment of Miss Stone's account of her experiences "In the Grip of the Brigands."

WHIT-WEEK ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

As last year, the Whitsuntide meetings were fitly inaugurated by that of the Sunday School Association, held in the Throne Room at the Holborn Restaurant on Tuesday morning. The President, Lady O'HAGAN, entertained a large company of representatives of schools and societies at breakfast, and as soon after ten o'clock as the room could be cleared the business meeting was held, Lady O'HAGAN in the chair.

After an opening hymn, the treasurer, Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., made his annual statement, in manner as entertaining as ever, referring to the adverse balance of £59 15s. 8d., due partly to the fact that over £100 had been spent on books more than last year, and pointing to the remedy in the hands of members, that the new books now loading their shelves should at once be bought.

Mr. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. secretary, in presenting the annual report, read a letter of greeting from Mr. I. M. Wade, who, as his predecessor, had held the post of secretary for forty years.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a reference to last year's New Century festival and the new departure in holding an autumnal meeting at Leeds in connection with the B. and F. U. A. meeting. Special reference was made to the loss sustained by the death of Dr. Vance Smith, Miss M. E. Martineau, and Miss C. A. Martineau, who had been not only subscribers but active helpers in the literary work of the Association. A new edition of Miss C. A. Martineau's "Voices of Nature" had been issued only a few months before her death. A legacy of £50 had been received from her. The publications of the year had been more extensive and varied than ever before, involving a heavy outlay, the bill for printing, binding, &c., amounting to £624 16s. 11d., £123 more than last year, and the cost of several books would come into the next annual account. A deficit of nearly £60 was a reminder to subscribers that more help was needed. The sale of books had produced £905 5s. 5d., an increase of £34 on 1900. Subscriptions and donations produced £292 16s. 6d., almost the same as last year. Among the books published, in addition to the annual volumes of "The Helper" and "Young Days" were "The Books of the Old Testament; A Short Introduction," by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, "The Study of St. Francis of Assisi," by Miss F. E. Cooke, "Hymn Lessons; The Teachers' Note Book," by Miss Marian Pritchard, "Twelve Hymns and their Writers," by the Rev. V. D. Davis, "Travel and Life in Palestine"; Five Lectures by Rev. J. T. Sunderland, illustrated by lantern slides; new editions of Miss C. A. Martineau's "Voices of Nature," and the Rev. Frank Walter's "Studies of Shakespeare's Plays," while other new books were in the press. Slides had been secured for several series of lantern lectures, for loans to affiliated schools, and had been much appreciated. Particulars were given of the third Summer Session for Teachers, to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, from Friday, July 4, to Saturday, July 12. The report expressed great regret at the long illness of Mr. B. C. Hare, the business manager of the Association, with the hope that he might soon be able to resume his duties. The returns appended to the report showed 288 schools connected with the Association, with 3,726 teachers, 34,076 scholars, of whom 9,200 were over sixteen years of age.

Commenting on the chief points of the report, Mr. Pritchard said that they were mainly a publishing association, and called attention to the new books published during the year. The volume of "The Helper" for the present year was the fifth issued, and was to be the last, though perhaps something else would take its place. No better or more helpful books had been issued by their Association. Mr. Weatherall's book on the Old Testament had been noticed far beyond their own circle, and was sure to have a wide influence. That day was published a new book by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, "Simple Talks about Religion," which, he was sure, would receive a warm welcome.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that the report was interesting reading for all who were interested in Sunday-schools—a movement which must ever be progressive, productive of new and better methods, to meet the needs of the times. She welcomed the reference in the report to the Education Act, a measure which had occupied the minds of all interested in the future of the children of the country and the prospects of freedom in religious thought. In that Bill education certainly did not occupy the first place. It was an attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable, a shift to secure the support of those whose support was deemed necessary to the Government. One of the main supporters of the Government, and of the reigning family therein, had told them that there was but one door in the Board school—that is, the Unsectarian school, and that led to the street, while in the Voluntary school there were two doors, one into the school and the other into the Church. But was there not a third door which he forgot, which led through the church into the polling-booth? That was certainly in many minds one of the most important to the advocates of the Bill. But if they were told that the Board school had only one door, by that door the child came in from his home, and by the same door returned. They did not wish the child without its parents to be taken into any place of worship. If that Bill became law the question of the influence of parents over their children would become of great importance. At a recent discussion at Burnley she had been struck by the fact that after hearing the speeches on the other side she could have been furnished with no better arguments against the Bill. They had been told by the clergyman of the Church of England that in the Church schools alone Christianity was taught; and that was what they must expect, if the Church had entire control over the schools. It was nonsense to say that the minority should establish a school of its own. It would be most uneconomical, and for the most part quite impossible. There was a want of logic in the argument on the other side, but they as a body could make one of the most logical and effective stands against a piece of legislature which was going to put the clock back for many years, depriving the people of the right to educate their children in religion, and interfere between the parents and their children.

The Rev. R. TRAVERS HERFORD, who seconded the resolution, said that he brought a word from the country, and of gratitude to the Association. They had been greatly helped by what the Association had done in the matter of class books and of reward books. It was an admirable plan to receive, as they had done, a box of samples of all the new books, so that they could see what to buy. And the catalogue of reward books had been most useful. Since referring to it in the selection of prizes they had had no complaints of the books given, which had not always been the case.

The Rev. J. L. HAIGH moved the thanks of the meeting to the officers and committee, and the appointments for the coming year, the Rev. James Harwood being elected President. In doing so, Mr. Haigh referred to the Oxford summer session for teachers, and urged that the larger schools, particularly in manufacturing districts, should see to it that not only their ministers and superintendents, but their junior teachers attended. It was an experience which in itself was an education. The devotional, academic, and practical elements were admirably blended with the social, so that in his opinion the character of the meeting was not to be improved.

The Rev. J. ELLIS, in seconding, drew attention to the more than 9,000 scholars over sixteen, and the importance of laying hold of them, to win them for service in the church and good citizenship in the nation.

The PRESIDENT then moved the following resolution:—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the following representatives of affiliated and kindred societies:—Irish Non-Subscribing Sunday School Association, Rev. T. Dunkerley, B.A.; Scottish Sunday School Union, Rev. H. Williamson; South Wales Sunday School Union, Rev. T. J. Jenkins; Merthyr and Aberdare Sunday School Union, Mr. Lewis H. Williams; Bolton District Sunday School Union, Rev. J. J. Wright; Bury District Sunday School Union, Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A.; Liverpool Sunday School Society, Miss Alison Hall; London Sunday School Society, Rev. W. W. Cheynoweth Pope; Manchester District Sunday School Association, The President, Mr. J. Wigley; Midland Sunday School Association, Rev. W. J. B. Tranter; North Cheshire Sunday School Union, Rev. W. Harrison; North East Lancashire Sunday School Union, Mr. J. T. Bibby; North Midland Sunday School Association, Rev. W. Whitaker, B.A.; South Cheshire Sunday School Union, Rev. J. C. Street; Southern Sunday School Union, Rev. E. Solly Anthony; South Eastern Sunday School Union, Rev. Frederic Allen; Western Sunday School Union, Mr. Wm. Colfox; Yorkshire Sunday School Union, Rev. John Ellis.

To this the Rev. T. DUNKERLEY and Mr. J. WIGLEY responded, the latter speaking as President of the Manchester District Sunday School Association.

THE CONFERENCE.

At the conclusion of the business meeting a conference was held, at which four papers were read, on "Religious Education in the Sunday-school." The first paper, by the Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED, on "Principles and Ideals," we reserve for publication in full next week. Its earnest plea for truth speaking, and the means by which we may come to know the truth and learn how to impart it, will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it.

The Part of the Superintendent.

The Rev. H. S. PERRIS read the second paper, on "The Part of the Superintendent," of whom he spoke as the chief guardian of order, without which there could not be happiness or success in the work. Children naturally loved order, when it was attained by fair and considerate means. Yet discipline without sympathy was of little good. The best superintendent was one who spoke with authority, but also with the tacts of loving insight. The importance of the personal factor in the superintendent was also emphasised, both in relation to teachers and scholars. He must not become a victim to preconceptions or hard and fast rules, but should have elasticity of mind, and must respect the individuality of teachers and scholars, who might bring in new ideas and fresh temperaments, while the various homes from which scholars came should also be borne in mind. The superintendent must realise the effect of his own personality on the school, and beware lest his own faults make havoc of it; above all let him pray for patience of speech and habit, and, if it be in him, let him infuse joy as well as dignity and order into the school It was his part to give guidance to teachers and also sympathy and encouragement. As to whether the minister should also be superintendent of the school, no general rule could be laid down. In some places no one else was willing or competent to do the work; but where possible the minister ought not to be required to take that added responsibility. His pulpit work was bound to suffer from the strain, and that ministry ought not to be concentrated in one pair of hands. Best of all was that the minister should be an occasional welcome visitor to the school, with perhaps special monthy services for the religious instruction of the whole school and week-evening classes for elder scholars. He made an earnest appeal to cultured laymen to give their strength to this work of superintending and teaching; it needed the most cultured minds and the ripest personality. The superintendent must have a care for the opening and closing services at school, in which there must be nothing perfunctory. Prayer must be short and simple, but with real feeling. Children quickly discovered insincerity. The one essential condition of success was faith in the efficiency of the moral and religious education of the young.

In the Junior Classes.

Mrs. W. TUDOR JONES read the next paper, her subject being "In the Junior Classes." She spoke as one who had come from orthodoxy to a Unitarian school, and seeing the small number of children, she had concluded that parents, who were Unitarians, did not wish to bias the minds of the children, but yet allowed them to go to other schools, where their companions went, and that they did not care to instil the principles and truths of their faith into the children. Many Unitarians did not realise the awful wrench it was to give up the old orthodox position, when at first all seems lost and there is danger of growing hard and faithless. They would not give poisonous food to their children, nor let them judge for themselves in temporal things, and they ought not to care less for the spiritual culture of the little ones. Definite teaching must be given; for teaching the children would get, of a worse kind unless they themselves gave what was best. Their teaching should be systematic, with careful accuracy in words and sentences, easily apprehended, and illustrated, with a blackboard where possible. And they must know the children at home as well as in school, and must teach by the spirit of their life and keep in touch and sympathy with each child. It was of the utmost importance to secure a good grounding in the junior classes. As to the matter of teaching, the child's mind was many sided, and intellect must have its due place in religion. They should draw lessons from home life and the playground, and make right conduct appear beautiful. By lessons from nature and human nature they should connect the true and beautiful with religion and God, so that the child might realise that he lived in a friendly universe and that religion was the most natural thing. They must be careful to teach only what was true. Veracity appeared to have a slight hold on many people in matters of theology and religion. But they should also lay stress on the beautiful, and let the children feel that religion was not only striving but enjoying; they should aim at beautiful singing, besides having beautiful pictures on the walls. And they must dwell also on the good, and let the children feel that life in large measure was strenuousness in overcoming evil with good. Even the youngest child should be trained to pass from knowledge to devotion and grow into reverent habits. So the whole nature would be cultivated. In such teaching too much emphasis could not be laid on the highest and noblest life, the life of the Master. The highest aspect of life was not in the knowledge of things, but in the growth of pure feeling, in being good and doing good.

In the Senior Classes.

The concluding paper was read by the Rev. George Critchley, with criticisms and suggestions as to work "In the Senior Classes," which may usefully be the subject of careful consideration and discussion, and we therefore reserve this paper also for future publication in full. Mr. Critchley's point was that the old system of class teaching could no longer hold the young people, and a new departure should be made in the direction of a larger union or guild, in which the responsibility of self-culture and mutual help should be more largely thrown upon the young people themselves.

At the conclusion of the papers, the Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON moved, and the Rev. H. WILLIAMSON seconded, a vote of thanks to the President and the readers of papers. This was very cordially passed, and acknowledged by Lady O'HAGAN, who added a word as to the vital importance of the training of teachers, and the great advantage that would be gained if their young ministers on leaving college could devote a year or so especially to Sunday-school work, and impart their fresh knowledge and enthusiasm for learning to the teachers.

The meeting then terminated, and in the afternoon parties were organised under experienced leadership to visit Kew Gardens, the Zoological Gardens, the Tower and the Tate Gallery. The weather was not particularly genial, but towards evening cleared delightfully. At Essex Hall, afternoon tea was provided by the ladies of the Association.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

"SOME THOUGHTS ON CHRISTOLOGY."

THE Essex Hall Lecture was delivered by the Rev. Dr. JAMES DRUMMOND, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford, on Tuesday evening.

The chair was taken by Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and there was a large attendance.

The subject of the lecture was "Some Thoughts on Christology." To discuss with any approach to adequacy the whole doctrine of the person of Christ, Dr. Drummond said, was not possible within the limits of a lecture; and he should, therefore, not enter into controversy with those who held extreme views on either side, whether pledged to the ecclesiastical doctrine of the Incarnation, or denying any special importance to questions of Christology, but should confine himself to a constructive attempt to help those to whom the ecclesiastical dogma had become obsolete, as neither credible in itself nor resting on the basis of primitive Christianity, but in whose religious affections, nevertheless, Jesus filled a large and unique place. There were many people, not only avowed Unitarians, but scattered through various denominations and even outside all the churches, of whom that was true, and who were seeking for a view rich in spiritual warmth and life-giving power, while at the same time fully recognising the results of scientific and critical inquiry. To them his lecture was addressed.

The Christian Consciousness.

The basis of their inquiry could no longer be an infallible Bible, nor an infallible Church, for neither of which could any valid claim to authority be established; but there remained to them what was called the Christian consciousness, the peculiar form and quality of the religious spirit produced by Christianity. This the lecturer described in the following terms:—"There is a graciousness and purity of soul, a tender regard for others, a self-forgetfulness of love, a glad and trustful acceptance of the divine will, a sense of intimate communion with God, a felt relationship with Christ, which we recognise as specifically Christian. When we meet a man in whom these traits are evident, we say, Behold a Christian indeed, in whom is no guile, and we do not ask what sect he belongs to, or what creed he professes. The seal of divine sonship is on his brow; and, be he orthodox or heretic, he is above both, and belongs to the fellowship of saints."

Interpretation of that Consciousness.

The convictions at the root of such a life must be interpreted by the theologian, who must distinguish what is essential from extraneous accretions and the limitations of individual experience, and also from the dogmatic expressions of any one age, moulded by passing phases of philosophical thought. Thus the prevalent custom of appealing to Christian experience as a certain proof of the traditional dogma must be avoided. It was common for the evangelical Christian, conscious of the life-giving power of Christ in his heart, to leap to the conclusion that the definition of the Council of Chalcedon was thereby confirmed, and that whatever historical criticism might do, the dogma of the Incarnation was rendered certain. But it was obvious that no subjective experience could prove the reality of a far-distant historical event, and whoever would cast an impartial look beyond the enclosure of his own inherited thought would perceive amid diversity of doctrine a substantial identity of experience. As they pierced down to the deepest seats of Christian faith and piety, they became aware of a unity of spirit, the creator rather than the creature of dogma, which required for its full expression something larger and more comprehensive than the symbols of any sect. The anathemas of Councils and the denunciations of controversialists did not in reality mark the separation between the devout and the profane. Their aim must be to reach the elementary impressions and convictions which were antecedent to dogma, and, so far as they were able, to express these in a form of doctrine suitable to the present state of thought and knowledge.

What Jesus was to his Disciples.

Turning to the records of primitive Christianity, the lecturer noted the chief elements of the impression made by Jesus upon the early disciples. Thus he appeared as a religious teacher, who bore witness to the truth, with prophetic power, which searched the hearts of man, and with authority, because he had within himself the deep fountain of life and direct vision of divine truth. Such truth as he taught could not be separated from the teacher without loss to its power and scope. It was not like new scientific knowledge, such as Copernicus made known, and which then remained the property of mankind without further reference to the discoverer. Spiritual truth could not be understood or received solely through an intellectual process, and words of teaching required a knowledge of the life from which they sprang to be fully understood.

The Teacher and the Truth he Taught.

"Hence it is that Christian truth is retained in the world, not by dead propositions, but by living persons in whom it dwells, and that he who first announced it remains its permanent revealer through the sympathetic infusion of his own spirit into the hearts of his disciples. But if it be said that at least, when once the sun of truth has risen in the soul, we are ever after independent of him who first caused the light to shine, it may be so with some pure souls who have no night, and on whom the clouds never fall; but most of us require renewal, and cling to some stronger soul as we pass through the dark valley or feel our way amid the mountain mists, and many a time we have to see by another's light; and in whom shall we find such full assurance of faith as in him who stands in the centre of the great company of saints, and whose light, streaming from the opened heavens, is reflected in every face?"

Inspiration of the Unseen Friend.

The sense of permanent relation to Christ could not then be satisfied by simply regarding him as an example in any literal sense, but rather as a spirit of life, what Paul called a "quickening spirit," dwelling in the heart by faith, a force of inward life, nurturing with holy love the spiritual roots of our being. That influence which one soul exerted on another was profoundly mysterious, but it was matter of common experience, where the image of the departed, reverently preserved, was an abiding inward presence, pouring balm on sorrow and bracing for the conflict of duty. And what father or mother, brother or sister, friend or teacher of long ago, might be to the individual, messengers between the visible and the invisible, that Christ was to his Church.

Revealer of Divine Truth.

Thus Christ became a medium of divine revelation to the world, the truth of God being made clear in his life, just as in another sphere the order and beauty of Nature speak to us of God. Above all, he brought men to a more living sense of personal communion with God and trust in the Father's love. That Divine love, which had spoken to their hearts in Christ, brought a new sense of sin, showing them how far they had been alienated from the life of God, but at the same time showing the way of deliverance.

"Love, they perceived, was of God; and the love which in Christ had filled their hearts with wonder and joy had its source in God, and was indeed the Spirit of God manifesting itself in man, and pleading through human lips and human hands. And still this experience lives; men ready to despair under the sense of sin and estrangement from God feel in Christ the touch of Divine grace, and become conscious that they are received into a communion with God which is the beginning of spiritual life, and the earnest of final victory."

Christology to be founded on these facts.

Such, the lecturer said, are the facts of Christian consciousness on which our Christology must be founded. In framing a doctrine they might resort to the ancient terms which expressed the feelings of the newly awakened soul, and see what meaning they might still retain; but it should not be forgotten that even within the borders of the New Testament itself different types of doctrine were apparent, and their expression was found associated with obsolete ideas. They must endeavour to draw forth the essential meaning which would abide as the permanent possession of a spiritual faith.

New Testament Affirmations.

Dr. Drummond then recounted the great affirmations of the New Testament concerning Jesus; and first, that he was a man in the full and complete sense of that word—a truth directly contradicted by the orthodox doctrine of the Incarnation. He was also the Christ, "anointed with holy spirit and power," standing on the confines of two ages and belonging to both, drawing to a focus in himself the inspiration of Lawgiver, Psalmist and Prophet, and being the first-born in that great company of brethren in whom the life of the spirit, ceasing to be Jewish, was to become universal. And thus he was the founder of a spiritual kingdom of God—the reign of God in the soul of man, and all were to be anointed with the same spirit. Then in a profound sense he was the Saviour from sin, and Lord, in the sense of spiritual leadership. He was the Son of God, the first-born among many brothers; and if he was called "the only" or "unique" son, that was to mark his pre-eminence as revealer of the divine sonship of man.

Conclusion.

And so the lecture was brought to a conclusion:—

It is as the founder of this spiritual brotherhood that Jesus stands alone in his pre-eminence as "the Son of God." However you may criticise his history, whatever blots some may suppose they can detect in his character, whatever limitations there undoubtedly are in his teaching, this fact remains, that he caused the ideal of Divine Sonship to shine in the darkness of the world, and that wherever faith in him is simple and true this ideal works as a redeeming power within the heart. If, as St. Paul says, he was "appointed Son of God according to the Spirit of holiness," and if the Spirit of holiness is the Spirit of God which dwelt in him and thus there is a metaphysical connection between him and God, so is it also, in their various degrees, with his followers. "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God," and the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the deal dwells in them. And now we see what meaning we can attach to the idea of pre-existence. That the actual man, Jesus of Nazareth, pre-existed, is not taught by the most orthodox creed. But the earthly man is not all. The Spirit which was manifested in him was "the Eternal Life," which weaves together the ages, which has ever dwelt in holy souls, which has spoken through lawgiver and prophet, and which is the idea lying at the heart of creation, so far, at least, as it is cognisable by man. Every one who believes and loves has this eternal life. But most of us walk in shadows, and are strangely blind to the mystery of our own being. We too have come from God, we know not how; we too, when our time arrives, must go to God; and meanwhile, as we move between two eternities, we must love unto the end; for he that loves abides already in God, and God in him. When these things are dim, and the earthly element in us threatens to swallow up the Divine, we turn in faith to the creative and illuminating soul who has been to us as the bread and the water of life, and the peace of God steals gently into our hearts and we feel once more that God is always nigh to man, in order that man may draw nigh to Him, and rest for ever in His love.

THE following resolution, moved by the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, seconded by Miss Florence Melly, member of the Liverpool School Board, was passed unanimously at a meeting of the Congregation of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, on Sunday evening, May 11, 1902:—

That this meeting of worshippers at Hope-street Church, Liverpool, earnestly protests against the Education Bill now before Parliament, for the following among other reasons: that in their view it tends to the destruction of a just popular control over schools maintained by the public purse, breaks down even the existing inadequate safeguards against sectarian aggression, eliminates the statutory obligation to provide school places for all, hinders women from taking their due part in the direction of public education, fails to co-ordinate primary and secondary education, or to establish unity of educational authority, and in no way tends to the general improvement of the education of the people.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE ANNUAL SERVICE.

Little Portland-street Chapel was filled by a large congregation at the annual service on Wednesday morning, which was conducted by the Rev. HENRY GOW, of Leicester, who also preached the sermon. The service was beautiful in its simplicity and the spirit of earnestness and reverence that pervaded it. Most fittingly it began with Mr. Gill's hymn,

We come unto our father's God, sung to the familiar tune, and at the second verse a gleam of sunlight touched the preacher and the flowers on the reading-desk.

Their joy unto their God we bring;
Their song to us descendeth;
The spirit who in them did sing
To us his music lendeth.
His song in them, in us, is one;
We raise it high, we send it on,
The song that never endeth.

The Collect was the last prayer in Dr. Martineau's Tenth Service, beginning—

O Thou who didst send Thy word to speak in the Prophets and live in Thy Son, and appoint Thy Church to be witness of divine things in all the world, revive the purity and deepen the power of its testimony, and through the din of earthly interests and the storm of human passions let it make the still small voice of Thy Spirit inly felt.

The Lessons, from Jeremiah i. and Romans xii., were followed by Whittier's hymn, "Dear Lord and Father of Mankind," and a prayer, in the spirit of which we could have wished that our whole people might have joined. A hymn before and after the sermon and the Benediction completed the service. The collection for the Association amounted to £40 8s. 6d. Mr. John Harrison's part in the service as organist was helpful as ever.

THE SERMON.

"Open Vision and the Living God."

"Then said I, Ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak; for I am a child."—Jeremiah i. 6.

The mark of the true prophet is a great humility united with a deep sense of the importance of the work which he is called upon to do. "I am a man of unclean lips," says Isaiah. "Ah, Lord God! behold I cannot speak; for I am a child," says Jeremiah. This intense feeling of unworthiness and weakness is the mark of a true prophet and a true church. There is no jaunty self-complacency, no sense of superiority to others, no selfish ambition in the true prophet or in the true church. "He that seeketh to save his life shall lose it, and he that loseth his life for my sake and the Gospel shall find it," is as absolutely true of churches as it is of men. It is the church which forgets itself in its work, it is the church which asks nothing, which desires nothing for itself but greater power to work for righteousness and to proclaim the truth; it is this church alone which can succeed. The self-conscious church, the church which is always demanding recognition, and pressing its claims and wondering what other churches think about it—the church which prides itself upon its wisdom or its common sense, the church which is egotistical and conceited is a church, whether large or small, which can do no great spiritual work. To forget self in a passionate devotion to righteousness and truth is the sure way of salvation and effectiveness for churches as for individuals. But mere humility is by itself a very dangerous virtue. It may paralyse our efforts, it may take the heart out of us, it may fill us with despair. There is a way of describing the littleness and weakness of our churches which is very modest, very accurate, and very well-meant, and which at the same time is very hopless, very enervating. It is well undoubtedly to face facts unflinchingly and to see the condition of our churches exactly as it is. I do not think it is easy to exaggerate the loneliness and the difficulties of many of our ministers, or the unsatisfactory condition of many of our congregations. We are working in a corner in the midst of teeming crowds of men and women, hardly touching them, hardly known by them. The facts of our isolation and our littleness, often our contented littleness, are certainly not cheerful taken by themselves. Wise humility will not conceal or forget those facts. Humility will do more, and will go on to repudiate, the old false reason sometimes given for our littleness. Some of us used to be fond of saying—it is much more rarely said to-day—that the great majority of men are always very foolish, and will always love error, and are by nature incapable of pure truth. They need doctrines accommodated to their low intelligence and their low aims, and the prevalence of orthodoxy is a sign of how little intelligence there is and how low are the aims of people in general. Well, we shall repudiate that explanation and shall say—with, I believe, absolute truth—that our congregations and ministers on the whole are very much of the same calibre as other congregations, no wiser and no better. It would be a wretched exhibition of vanity and self-conceit to boast of superior intelligence and virtue even if it were true, but I don't believe it is true. We can turn to other Christian churches with a glad recognition and sympathy, and say to them, We know there are many among you better than ourselves, many who are abler and more learned. We look up to your leaders with admiration and to your teaching with respect.

But all this sympathy and modesty is, of course, utterly inadequate alone. A genial self-forgetful benevolence, wishing well all round, does not constitute a living church. A man can only be the true friend of another if he has opinions of his own, a character of his own, and definite aims and ideals of his own; he cannot begin to be a friend merely on the basis of good wishes and genial sympathy. And a true church which is to be the friend of other churches must have opinions of its own, a character of its own, and definite work and ideals of its own, and must not be afraid to say just what they are. You cannot have a church merely on the basis of good works and genial sympathy and fine sentiments. Its sympathy and good wishes are not worth having unless it is an independent self, unless it has strong independent faith and thought and character. You have no right to be tolerant, you cannot be tolerant in the true sense unless first of all you believe something to be true with all your heart and mind.

Modest sympathy then is not enough. The second mark of a true prophet and a true church is the conviction, God hath need of me. It is an almost overwhelming sense of the work we are called upon to do, it is the sense that we are wanted, that a Gospel has been given to us which men are waiting for. We ought to feel our insufficiency—feel it intensely not as a phrase but as a fact—but still more deeply we ought to feel the constraining call of God to speak and work on behalf of the truth we have received.

Think of the religious condition of our time. It is a time pre-eminently of agnosticism. The agnostic is everywhere in the churches and out of them. It takes many forms, but essentially it is the denial of the open vision, it is disbelief in natural religion,—it is disbelief in man's power to know God. There is the agnostic who believes in Christianity but disbelieves in God. He reverences Jesus, he recognises the truth and beauty of his moral teaching, he longs for the peace and joy that were in Christ, but of the Father, the living God, who was everything to Jesus, he knows nothing. Christianity to him is a history of beautiful feelings and heroic actions, not a revelation of God's love. There is the agnostic who loves ritualism and symbolism. He finds himself in the presence of indescribable mystery; nothing can be expressed, nothing can be understood. God's spirit cannot speak direct with our spirit. It must be conveyed to us through material instruments; the sacraments, the priestly touch, the visible Church, these and such as these are the only means through which God speaks to man. This is essentially agnosticism, and agnosticism of a very materialistic type. Then there is the agnostic who believes in God only because he believes in Jesus Christ. Nature to him seems red in tooth and claw, and without any mark of God's love. The history of humanity apart from Christ is a history of wars and greed and ignorant striving and failures and sins. He finds no evidence of a Father's love and guidance working throughout all history. The vision of God spoken of by modern poets as they stand alone with nature or with death is to such an agnostic at best a beautiful dream. There is nothing substantial, nothing certain, about it. The one convincing proof for God is the life and death of Jesus Christ. This form of agnosticism is, I believe, growing at the present time. It is strange that it should be so. Biblical critics of many schools and creeds are admitting more and more that there are legendary elements in the Gospels, and that the birth and resurrection of Jesus as related in the various Gospels are difficult to reconcile and hard to believe; and yet amid this growing uncertainty of the historical documents they cling to Jesus, and to Jesus alone, as the one indubitable witness to the existence and the love of God. If I give up my faith in the supernatural, they say, I give up everything. That is a profoundly agnostic attitude. It is to give up all faith in natural religion. Such agnostics, we must remember, are often very noble men; such agnostics, we must admit with shame, often feel the power and help of God more truly through their sacraments or through their faith in Christ, than we who believe in the open vision and in the living God. But it is none the less true that those who find God only through material instruments or the single personality of Christ are more agnostic than we who think we find Him in Nature and in Man. And then there is the man who is commonly understood by the name agnostic. He is a man who finds no certain evidence of God anywhere; he gives up the search in despair, he believes it is beyond the scope of human faculty, and he sets himself sternly and simply to the doing of his duty.

That man is really less agnostic than the other three, if he believes in the doing of his duty whatever happens. Such a belief in duty really involves faith in a spiritual principle. If a man clings to duty with a passionate conviction that it is right to do right whatever happens, if he follows truth with the conviction that truth is worth any sacrifice or suffering, he has faith in eternal righteousness and eternal truth which is the beginning of a faith in God. This form of agnosticism is then really less agnostic than that which takes the form of sacramentarianism or absolute dependence upon Christ, because it believes in the possibility of the individual soul to find truth and follow righteousness.

Then, lastly, there is that worst and most dangerous agnosticism which means ignorance and utter carelessness about the spiritual life. "There is an almost universal decay," says a recent writer, "among the massed and unheeded populations of our towns of any form of spiritual religion. Morally, they accept a standard which is the astonishment of their friends. Patience, cheerfulness, family affection, neighbourliness, are widespread, but the spiritual world has vanished. Nature, literature, art, religion count for little or nothing with them. A background to life, some common bond uniting men despite the discordance of the competitive struggle, some worthy subject of devotion or enthusiasm behind the aimless passage of the years, some spiritual force or ideal elevated over the shabby scene of temporal failure, this is the deep imperative need of the masses in our great cities to day."

There is a call in these various forms of agnosticism to a church which indeed believes in the open vision and the living God.

I know it is very easy to talk cant about the open vision and the living God. Not every one who follows Wordsworth in speaking of God among the mountains has really felt Him there. Not every one who follows Tennyson in talking of the revelation of God which comes to us through death or love, has really felt Him in these things. These are high, rare, wonderful experiences; and even if we feel them at all, they are beyond our understanding, and often beyond all our expression. Yet rare and vague as the open vision may be for most of us, we do believe in it, do we not, with all our hearts? We believe in God as speaking to His children now. We find Him not alone in Church, in Bible, in Jesus, but as a living God working, loving, speaking in the world to-day.

It is a large and catholic work to which we are called, not to the advancement of a little sect, but to the establishment of a Catholic Church based on belief in the living God, a God revealed by all history, by all nature, by all great thoughts and creeds, and most truly by the living soul, a God who can be seen and known by purity of heart. The need is very great and the opportunity for a large open faith, if it is large and open, is very great as well. We must not be disheartened by our littleness, we must not be contented with it.

I have spoken of the religious needs of our time, think now of its intellectual opportunities. The stars in their courses seem to be fighting for us; great tendencies are helping us, and yet we remain just where we were. Think of Biblical criticism, how it helps us, how it makes for our conception of Jesus, how it is continually undermining the theories and supposed facts with which orthodoxy is involved. I would, above all things, avoid exaggeration; but surely it must be admitted that there is a growing tendency amongst scholars in the English Church, and amongst the liberal Nonconformists as well as amongst German scholars, to admit that Jesus Christ was, as we have maintained for many years, a human being of essentially the same nature with ourselves; and that the stories which would make him more than man, or even God himself, are legends which cannot substantiate themselves when examined with the impartial reverent scrutiny of the historian. There are tens of thousands in all the churches and outside all the churches who are as sure of it as we are; but we, I think, are the only church which boldly, gladly, and persistently adopts the absolute humanity of Jesus as part of our religion.

Think again of the teachings of science, how they tend to undermine the conceptions with which orthodoxy is bound up. Science tells us of the vast extent of the universe, it tells us of the great age of the world, it tells us of the universal rule of law and of the development of life. If the account of science be true, then the story of the creation in Genesis cannot possibly be true; if the account of science be true, then the story of the fall of man cannot possibly be true. Science tells us of a long slow growth and progress, of men advancing from barbarism, of lower forms of life evolving into higher forms; it knows nothing of a primitive state of purity and goodness. There have been vicissitudes, momentary back eddies in the long procession of the years, but on the whole the tendency has been to a nobler, larger life. And yet many orthodox doctrines are involved with the account in Genesis of the fall of man. All this constitutes, I will not say our strength, because we are not strong, but our opportunity. It is not a cause for pride; but it is a call to harder and more hopeful work. There is need of a religion which has nothing which is out of harmony with the wisest thoughts of history, with science and philosophy and poetry. It is this opportunity which, I think, impresses liberal outsiders from time to time like Mrs. Humphry Ward. They have come to their thought of God, their idea of Jesus and the Bible, without any influence from our churches, perhaps even without knowing that such churches exist. They find the best literature and philosophy and science all making for a Catholic Christian Theism, and then they discover that there is a little group of churches which professes to teach and to believe just this which they have come to hold, and which is free from the untenable doctrines with which they have been compelled to break. They turn to us with hope and delight as Mrs. Ward did a few years ago. "You have the religion of the future," they say. "The whole course of modern thought is on your side. Why are you so small, so little confident, so careless about entering into the large work which lies ready to your hands? The fields are white with the harvest, where are the labourers who will reap?"

After a little time they tend to grow offended with us for our contented littleness, our provinciality, and our conservatism. It is not that they wish us to attack other churches; they often have a sympathy for the larger and older churches greater than many of us possess, and we have much to learn from them in this. Neither is it political conservatism to which they object; they do not know the struggles for civil and religious liberty through which our ancestors have passed, and which have wrought, or should have wrought, the love of liberty and faith in Free Church principles into our souls. But they see splendid opportunities of large work, and they do not see amongst us the faith or ability to take the opportunities which are offered. They see a growing alienation from orthodoxy, a growing agnosticism; they believe that there are tens of thousands whose religious needs cannot find satisfaction in orthodoxy and who do not know where to look for help. "'You are the church which can and ought to speak to these men and women," they say. "It needs faith, it needs largeness of sympathy, it needs freedom from narrow traditions, but it could be done if you cared to try," and then it seems to them that we do not care to try, and they are offended with us and give us up in despair, and they turn away hoping to find the church of the future elsewhere.

I do not think they always realise the many difficulties which we have to meet. Great tendencies are with us, no doubt, but there are also great tendencies against us. Against us are the venerable institutions, the great history, the noble buildings, the long roll of distinguished workers and thinkers in the Established Church and in the orthodox Nonconformist churches. Outward appearances are enormously against us. "Can any good come out of Nazareth?" is asked with the same sceptical contempt and disbelief in little things as was asked in the days of Jesus, and we have no heaven-sent prophet who shall confute the doubt by his personality and teaching. These are not difficulties which should make us contemptuous or fearful. Love of the venerable, the customary, the long tried, is a love to be respected. We ought not to expect such love and confidence to be quickly transferred to our own movement. We must show ourselves, through sympathy and sacrifice and faith, worthy to deserve such love before we can win it. The great orthodox conceptions were high-water marks of thought in the days when they were first taught, and in the minds of those who taught them. They were a power for good, they were the highest expression of truth and reality possible to the men who put them forth. They have helped the world, not hindered it. We must realise this and treat them with respect, and we must realise that there is within them some great eternal truth which it is for us to express, if we can, in yet nobler, higher ways.

This Association is, if I understand it rightly, a meeting of men and women who, with many diversities of opinion and with much variety of character, unite in believing in the open vision and the living God. It is a missionary association for the help of our weak churches and for the making known of our thoughts on spiritual religion. Bolder, more independent, thought, reverent towards all truth, fearless in expressing what it finds, broad in its sympathies, and generous in its appreciation of the past, this is one of our greatest needs, and is a work which this Association has done and can do much to encourage. We must, above all things, avoid self-satisfaction and conceit; the need of a fuller, deeper faith in God and man is the greatest need of our time, and if we feel the need, and really hold the faith we must seek to teach that faith, unworthy as we are. We are a very small community on whom a great demand is made, a small community which believes that it has a great truth to proclaim; it matters not how small we are if we really feel that God has need of us. and that there is work for us to do.

Surely if we feel this we should be all good comrades and true friends. We need not expect or hope to be agreed upon all questions of Church government or on all details of doctrine. I am not inclined to say "a plague on both your houses." The man into whose mouth Shakespeare put those words was more of a party man than any of the men to whom he spoke, and the men who most often use those words are men who belong to a small and select party of one. There is something supercilious in looking down on the conflict of sincere and earnest minds and despising it all. Differences must exist amongst us and may do us good: they stir and arouse us. We are bound to differ, differences belong to our character; but we might surely feel our essential unity more deeply, we might be better comrades, we might try to like and trust each other more. We are so lonely, so separated in our various spheres of labour. We need the sense of belonging to a large and open fellowship. Not only should we be good comrades to each other, but we should face the world as friends. We have the reputation of being narrow, exclusive, sectarian, loving our church and our name more than we love the truth, more than we care for God.

That charge is not altogether our own fault, it is certainly not altogether true. But if it is true at all, it is more of a disgrace to us than to any other church in Christendom. We must be lovers of all who love God and follow Christ. We must care more to stir men to find God themselves than to accept any doctrines of our own. Our message of a living God who speaks to every age and nation, and who is speaking in men's hearts to-day, is for the world, not for a few heretics here and there. We cannot give that message unless we respect and reverence the men and women to whom we have to speak. All this multitudinous variety of modern life, all great thoughts, all creations of art, all strong convictions, all sincere creeds have much to teach us; there is no speech nor language where God's voice cannot be heard. To us it has been committed to find the truth of God in all forms of faith to reveal Him as working in the laws of the universe and the history of man, to help men to believe in the religion of Jesus, in the love of God, a religion untouched by all criticism, unshaken by all science. Very humbly but very confidently and joyously let us take up the work God has given us to do.

At the conclusion of the service the President entertained over sixty guests to luncheon in the Throne Room at the Holborn Restaurant, including the Delegates and representatives of various missionary societies, the members of the Committee, and other guests.

THE ANNUAL BUSINESS MEETING.

The annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the President, Mr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., in the chair.

The secretary, the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, in presenting the annual report, said that a telegram had just been received from Dr. Samuel Eliot, President of the American Unitarian Association, conveying affectionate greetings to the Unitarians of England at their annual meeting. Letters of greetings had been received from Bishop Ferencz, bishop of the Unitarian Church of Transylvania, from Miss Westenholz, of Copenhagen, and the Rev. Tony André, of Florence, gratefully recalling memories of last year's inspiring meetings.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a reference to the interest and enthusiasm aroused by last year's New Century meetings, and especially the meetings of the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers, organised by the committee of the Association. In the volume of Addresses and Essays a fitting memorial of the International Council meetings had been produced. The Publications of the Association, in addition to the International volume, included a new and revised edition of the Essex Hall Hymnal; a cheap edition of the two volumes of "Laws of Life after the Mind of Christ," by the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, issued through the generosity of the late William Rathbone; "A Confession of Heresy," by T. J. Hardy, B.A.; "The Christology of the New Testament," by the Rev. R. B. Drummond; "Unitarian Affirmations," by the Rev. R. Travers Herford; "A Minister of God," selections from the writings of John Hamilton Thom, with a memoir, by the Rev. V. D. Davis. A new edition of Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" was in the press, and his "Back to Jesus" was being translated into Danish and Welsh. A translation into Hungarian of the International Council papers was also in preparation by Bishop Ferencz and others.

The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter's lectures on "The Bible in the Nineteenth Century" were announced for the autumn. A number of valuable tracts and pamphlets had also been published, and during the year 1,689 books, and 114,792 pamphlets had been gratuitously distributed. Special funds had also provided for a wide distribution of books and pamphlets in India and Scotland.

Grants had been made to about seventy congregations in England and Wales amounting to £2,030. In this connection the special services rendered by the Rev. James Harwood in visiting several districts was noted. The president had also rendered valuable service in many parts of the country. Towards the new church at Auckland, New Zealand, the Association had given £50, and had transmitted £276 from friends in England. Grants had also been made to the churches at Budapest and Melbourne, and £10 had been voted towards the cost of Lys over Landet, the weekly paper published by Mr. Theo Berg at Copenhagen.

For the Work in Scotland the McQuaker Fund had provided, a special donation of £750 being made towards the cost of the new church at Aberdeen. A course of four lectures on "The Gospels in the Nineteenth Century" had been given at Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, who had also preached at the three university cities and at Dundee. The fifth annual report of Work in India had contained the valuable report received from the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams, but its issue had been overshadowed by the news of his death on Nov. 16. Warm testimony was borne to the value of his work in India. It was noted that Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Poona, is at present studying as the Brahmo student at Manchester College, Oxford. Grants for mission work in the Khasi Hills and by Mr. Akbar Masih at Banda had been continued. The Special Services Committee had not been able to arrange with the Rev. Stopford Brooke to preach in different parts of the country, owing to other arrangements made by the congregations of Rosslyn Hill and Little Portland-street; but the Rev. J. E. Carpenter's lectures had been of great service, and he had promised another course on "The Origin and History of Ecclesiastical Institutions." As to Civil Rights the committee had rendered services in the matter of endowments and Trust deeds, and the Council had passed a resolution against the Government Education Bill. Dealing with Finance, the report pointed out that while the receipts from subscriptions, donations, and collections amounted to £2,440 14s. 3d., the expenditure on grants for missionary purposes (exclusive of foreign work) was £100 more than this, while the Book-room was expected to pay its own expenses, and salaries and cost of maintenance were practically met by interest on investments. Thus a strong plea for more support was made out. A gift of £1,000 had been received from the late Field-Marshal Sir Neville Chamberlain shortly before his death, and a similar sum had been placed in the hands of the committee by his executors for the benefit of the Southampton congregation. The year's Obituary recorded the loss of many good friends of the Association, including Mr. G. L. Bristow, who was a member of the committee, Mr. Edward Bromley, Mr. P. W. Clayden, Miss J. Durning Smith and Dr. Vance Smith, who had been members of the Council, and Mr. William Rathbone.

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD presented his statement as treasurer, drawing attention to various points in the accounts, of which a falling off of the amount of subscriptions by £25 was one. He recalled the old days of faithfulness under persecution, and suggested that if Unitarians had to put their hands in their pockets to pay school rates for schools, the management of which by two-thirds would be in the hands of those bound to the Thirty-nine Articles, they might put the other hand into their pockets to aid their Association in the dissemination of the truths of Unitarian Christianity.

The PRESIDENT having commented on various matters of interest in the report, and having made a sympathetic allusion to the death of the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams and the value of his work on India, moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE seconded the resolution. Their system, he said, was opposed to all those which claimed authority for themselves as essential to salvation. No system could rightly claim to be God's truth; each was man's truth, their way of looking on the mystery of the world and its Maker. Their own system was not new, but was the common foundation on which all built, for all these systems agreed that there is one God and that Jesus Christ has taught us to trust and love that God. That was what they as Unitarians asserted, and so they were Unitarians and Catholics at the same time. Unitarianism, neither in name nor in practice, was negation, but an assertion of the fundamental truth on which all religion is built. After making humorous allusion to charges made against the Association of plotting ecclesiastical tyranny, Mr. Hargrove spoke of the admirable work done by the Association, and declared its income to be well spent.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER then moved the election of the officers, council and executive committee, with the Rev. R. A. Armstrong as President, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, treasurer, and the following as members of the committee:—

Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., ex-President, Mr. J. Barlow, M.D., F.R.C.S., Mr. G. W. Brown, Mr. H. Chatfeild Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., the Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Miss Helen Brooke Herford, Mr. Herbert B. Lawford, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, the Rev. F. W. Stanley, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler.

In doing so Mr. Carpenter spoke very warmly of the services of the President, and rejoiced to know that his ability, zeal, and goodwill would remain no less devoted to the interests of the Association than during his year of office. Always engaged in heavy professional duties, Mr. Odgers never preferred their interest to the truths and love of his religion, but gave freely of time, thought, and labour to advance the cause of their church. In his place they were to have one who commanded universal admiration and respect in their churches, a leader who would dare anything, whose clearness of vision, directness of purpose, and tenacity of will were sure to carry the cause he espoused to a triumphant issue.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. W. COLFOX, and having been carried amid loud applause, Mr. ODGERS and Mr. ARMSTRONG acknowledged the vote.

The PRESIDENT moved, and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded, the following resolution:—

That the hearty welcome of this meeting be given to the representatives of the following affiliated and kindred Societies:—East Cheshire Union, the Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A.; Eastern Union, the Rev. Alfred Hall, M.A.; Irish Non-Subscribing Association, the Rev. Frederic Thomas; Liverpool District Association, the Rev. L. de Beaumont Klein, D.Sc.; London District Society, Mr. Thomas H. Terry; London and S.E.C. Provincial Assembly, Mr. John Harrison; Manchester District Association, the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A.; Midland Christian Union, the Rev. A. A. Charlesworth; North Lancashire and Westmorland Association, the Rev. H. V. Mills; North and East Lancashire Mission, the Rev. J. J. Wright; North-Midland Association, Mr. J. Harrop White; Northumberland and Durham Association, Mr. J. Baxter Ellis, J.P.; Scottish Unitarian Association. Dr. James Barlow; South Wales Unitarian Association, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins; South-East Wales Society, Lieut.-Colonel Thomas Phillips; Southern Unitarian Association, Mr. J. Cogan Conway; Western Union, the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A.; Yorkshire Unitarian Union, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A.

This was acknowledged by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford for England, the Rev. Frederic Thomas for Ireland, Dr. J. Barlow for Scotland, and Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Phillips for Wales, all the speakers recognising the cordial relations which subsisted between their district Associations and the B. and F.U.A., and the great value of its work.

The PRESIDENT moved, and the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT moved:—

That this meeting extends its warmest welcome to the representatives of liberal religious thought from abroad; and conveys an expression of its gratitude, esteem, and goodwill to those who, in all lands, are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the foreign correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cape Colony, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Sweden, and Switzerland.

This was acknowledged by Dr. J. C. Bose, of Calcutta, M. Hocart, of Brussels, and Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Poona, who is at present studying at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Z. Toyosaki, of Tokyo, Japan, was also to have responded, but was not present until later in the evening.

The PRESIDENT moved:—

This meeting is of opinion that while there are many anomalies and evils, and much confusion and waste, in the present administration of education in England, the Bill now before Parliament adds to these defects, instead of removing them; and perpetuates and intensifies denominationalism, which has always been the bane of education. It holds that in dealing with education, the State ought to concern itself not with the demands or desires of churches or sects, but with the needs and rights of citizens; and that the interests of efficient education require that the control of the schools and the appointment of teachers should be in the hands, not of private persons, but of public bodies; and when the community is called upon to bear the cost of maintenance, the public body should appoint not less than a two-thirds majority on every committee of management.

Unitarians have always taken an active part in every movement for the advancement of education, and this meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association would welcome legislation which made provision for a comprehensive and national system; but it deplores the introduction of the present Bill, because it proposes to give public money to denominational schools, and withholds adequate public management; while it does nothing to secure the improvement of education, or to safeguard the religious liberty of teachers.

Referring to the value of the Education Acts of 1870 and 1876, the President showed what extension of the scope of elementary education they had secured, how the schools maintained out of the rates were under direct popular control, and how far those schools were protected against sectarianism. The result had been that the present generation of children were better educated and more quick to learn than those of earlier times, and need of more advanced teaching had arisen. Various tentative efforts had been made, and the need of the proper co-ordination of elementary and secondary education under a single authority was strongly felt. Many had hoped that the present Bill would meet the need, but they had been disappointed, and he therefore moved that resolution.

Miss CLEPHAN, of the Leicester School Board, in seconding, said she had been astonished at the calm and philosophical attitude of some Unitarians towards this Bill. She was an opponent of the Bill, and spoke against denominationalism masquerading before the country as national education. There were two Bills, an actual and a visionary Bill. The latter had been introduced by an attractive speech of Mr. Balfour's in Parliament as promising an end of sectarian strife and a uniform system of education, but the actual Bill was of a very different character. After considerable study of it she was convinced it was a downright bad Bill, and she hoped it would either be passed in all its enormity or abandoned altogether. It struck at the root of the healthiest development of the past fifty years and the best part of the Act of 1870. She strongly felt that County Councils were already overburdened with work and could not give due attention to the great subject of education. By this Bill inducements were held out for fresh denominational efforts, elementary education would be confined within narrow limits, and no adequate provision for secondary education was made. Education was far too serious a matter to be made the catspaw of denominationalism. They as Unitarians ought not to lag behind, but as professed upholders of civil and religious liberty ought to stand in the forefront and declare that they would have their system free from any chance of ecclesiastical bias and control.

The resolution was unanimously carried, and an inclusive vote of thanks to the President, the Preacher, the Little Portland-street congregation and hospitable London friends, moved by the Rev. H. S. TAYLER, and seconded by Mr. J. BAXTER ELLIS, J.P., brought the meeting to a close.

Tea was then served in the council-room.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a crowded public meeting was held in Essex Hall.

The PRESIDENT, who again took the chair, said that he had been told his Presidential address ought to take a survey of the events of the year, but the only event of great importance in the past year affecting their churches was the establishment of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, and with that the B. and F.U.A. qua Association had nothing to do. It was a feather in the cap of the National Conference, with which they were all glad to work, and with which the Association always had worked harmoniously. He then told over again the story of the movement out of which their Association had grown, from the time when Lindsey gave up his living of Catterick in 1773 and established the Essex-street congregation in London, for avowedly Unitarian worship, although Unitarian belief was still under the ban of the law. In 1783 Lindsey established a society for promoting Christianity, and in 1791 the Unitarian Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge was started, mainly by Belsham, then of Hackney, but subsequently Lindsey's successor. In 1806 the Unitarian Fund was established for the promulgation of Unitarian doctrine, with Robert Aspland as secretary and Richard Wright as missionary, and in 1813 Unitarian disabilities were removed. In 1819 the Society for the Protection of the Civil Rights of Unitarians was established, and in 1825 those three societies were amalgamated in the B. and F.U.A., for the diffusion of the principles of Unitarian Christianity, and the other objects which before were aimed at by the separate societies. Sixty years later, on the initiative of Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, the old Essex-street Chapel was acquired and transformed into a central meeting-place and headquarters for their body. That Association had a doctrinal name and its objects were denominational, the diffusion of Unitarian Christianity. As to Unitarian Christianity different people would give different shades of meaning, but all were agreed that as Unitarians they believed in God, and that God is one, and to them Christianity meant that they looked to Jesus as guide, example, teacher and leader. They knew very definitely what they believed, each one for himself. Neither was there anything opposed to their principle of non-subscription in an association of individual Unitarian Christians wishing to diffuse what they believed to be true. They were not only at liberty to promote those doctrines, they were bound to do so. The principle of non-subscription they inherited from Puritan ancestors, who after the time of persecution learnt wisdom, and determined not to bind their places of worship to any special form of doctrine. They had the most definite doctrinal beliefs, but left their places of worship unfettered for future generations. Non-subscription was a right principle, but in itself was not enough. They must have definite religious convictions, and theirs was a clearly affirmative faith. They might have now and again to state the negative aspect of their beliefs as to God and Christ and the Bible, but he implored their teachers prevailingly to dwell on the positive aspects of the truth they held—their trust in the love of God, so that they could say with Browning, and might go a step further and say, "God's on His earth" and therefore all's right with the world. And so with their reverence and love for the Bible, all the more precious to them from the new light of criticism, and with Jesus their leader and teacher, a true man, of noble life, and noble self-sacrificing death, their best stimulus for a true life on earth. If they would teach these affirmative doctrines from the pulpit, in school, and in the home, they would do something to spread a knowledge of God's holy truth and something to make this world a better and happier place.

> God's in His heaven,
> All's right with the world,

At the conclusion of his address the PRESIDENT called upon Mrs. ALFRED C. OSLER, of Birmingham, who spoke as follows:—

"Obligations of our Heritage."

The custom of drawing a broad distinction between the affairs of this world and the sphere of religion is widespread and historical. In popular phraseology the world and the flesh is even now coupled with the name of the evil one, as opposed to the domain of God.

I knew a lady canvasser who pleaded so eloquently for her cause that her hearer, greatly interested, declared, "I agree with every word you say, and I hope your side will win!" "I may count on your vote, then?" said the canvasser. "I would give it you with all my heart," was the answer, "but, you see, I'm a 'Christian" and have nothing to do with the things of this world."

The conception of the secular and religious life as one and indivisible is, I venture to think, a very modern idea, and one peculiarly bound up with Nonconformity in its freer forms.

A religion which does not embody itself in any hierarchy or ceremonial must find expression in the common daily life of mankind. That it has done so is shown in the history of the last three centuries in England, by the close connection of Nonconformity with the political development of self-government, democracy, and religious freedom. What has been known as the Progressive or Liberal party has owed its strength largely to religious Nonconformity. We are not accustomed to look for discontent or reforming zeal in a prosperous, powerful class of which all men speak well; and the eternal vigilance which is the price of liberty is oftenest found among those not occupied in guarding accumulated treasure from the moth which corrupts and the thief who breaks through and steals.

A great gulf divides the social position of Nonconformists to-day from that occupied by their ancestors a century ago. We Unitarians—the most obnoxious of all Dissenters—no longer meet to worship in secret, in fear of our lives. We are permitted to rear beautiful churches in public thoroughfares, to adorn them with stained-glass windows, and spires, which might, I believe, even contain a peal of bells; we are free to meet here and speak our minds without bodily fear, though perhaps we have not yet attained to the perilous popularity of the warning, "Woe unto you, when all men shall speak well of you."

But we may profitably ask ourselves whether we enjoy this prosperity without any corresponding decrease of the spiritual integrity which distinguished our ancestors, and may say with Ruskin:

"Let us beware that our rest become not the rest of stones, which so long as they are torrent-tossed, and thunder-stricken, maintain their majesty; but when the stream is silent and the storm past, suffer the grass to cover them and the lichen to feed on them, and are ploughed down into dust."

It is not a grateful nor congenial task to recall injuries and revive antagonisms, but as the ancients paraded the skeleton at the feast, lest luxury should beget spiritual indifference, so it seems needful that we Dissenters (especially those of the younger generation) should remind ourselves how short a time has elapsed since ecclesiastical supremacy was relentlessly used to forbid us preaching, teaching or worshipping according to our consciences; that it is but fifty years since we were compelled to pay Church rates; less still since the doors of our Universities were kept shut in our faces on the plea that our admission would "poison the wells of religion and virtue."

John Bright, who was ever faithful to the obligations of his heritage, sturdily said, "Let it be remembered that I am avowedly a member of a Nonconformist body. My forefathers languished in prison by the acts of that Church which you now ask me to aggrandise. . . . I shall hold myself to have read, thought and lived in vain if I vote for a measure which in the smallest degree shall give any further power or life to the principle of State endowment."

Quakerism and Unitarianism have been ever in the van of that resistance to sacerdotalism which has been one of the chief factors in the history and character of our nation. While admitting this and taking pride in it, some among us are inclined to look on that transmitted instinct of resistance as a sort of rudimentary organ—a survival for which we have no longer any need.

I confess, with all modesty, to holding a totally opposite opinion, to the conviction that if ecclesiastical domination has lost much of its terrors, it is because of that long strenuous wrestle for liberty which the Puritan spirit maintained from generation to generation, until religious toleration—not even yet religious equality—was conceded.

That struggle is not yet ended: it is only its manifestations which change; and never has the battle raged on a more vitally important ground than that of the claim made by the Church to control our national education. We are thankful to recognise that there are a few rare minds among the clergy whose sense of justice and equity is so strong that it forbids them to claim for their Church or themselves benefits which involve injustice and tyranny to other sections of their fellow-citizens. I may be pardoned, perhaps, for referring with pride to a clergyman in my own city (personally unknown to me) who in a remarkable letter on the Education Bill, published in his parish magazine, has pointed out how in 14,000 schools the religion of one denomination will be taught by teachers appointed by that denomination, but paid by the contributions of all, and he says of that proposal:—"The Government make the Church a huge offer of money and power. . . . The question of conscience is obvious. Is it fair? Ought we as Churchmen to willingly accept, much less demand, such treatment? For my own part I say No! Better lose, or rather loose, our hold of all the children for awhile than grab them on such terms."

I was struck with some wise words recently uttered by the new Bishop of Worcester (Canon Gore) in Birmingham. He was, I think, repudiating any hankering after that general uniformity of religious belief which exercises such an attraction on many devout minds; and he said that while he did not look for nor perhaps desire such uniformity, he wished to see a friendly co-operation and mutual tolerance and respect between those who differed widely in creed. This was good, but I wish the Bishop had pointed out further that these desirable conditions can only be attained by religious equality. Toleration is obviously a virtue which cannot be entertained by the weak towards the strong, or by the injured towards the oppressor. Where public privileges are to be enjoyed by one section of the nation at the expense of another the tolerance on one side becomes merely tolerance of injustice.

A lax holding of one's own convictions, and the admission that one belief is as good as another, and none worth contending for, is not toleration, but intellectual indolence.

As Mr. John Morley has finely said, "The important thing is not that two people should be inspired by the same convictions, but rather that each of them should hold his or her own convictions in a high and worthy spirit."

A friend who was painfully struggling out of the fetters of a creed outgrown, said to me, "You who were born into a free spiritual atmosphere can hardly appreciate your privileges."

But even those who have never had to face that struggle for themselves can realise it in reading, for instance, that wonderful picture of spiritual travail and anguish given us in the story of Robert Elsmere. Surely, to realise it (as Mrs. Humphry Ward forces us to do) is to recognise our obligation to save the most honest, vigorous natures among the younger generation from the choice between such suffering and the stifling of their reason and intelligence—our obligation to hold open for them the door of progressive knowledge, insight and perception in spiritual life. How little, comparatively, it would have profited us if our forefathers, having reached in their religious thought to a milestone beyond the popular creed of their day, had simply crystalised their ideas into a fresh creed and left it to us as another garment which we must sooner or later outgrow or cramp our souls to endure! Our debt to our Church is that it has preserved our faith not as a dead garment, but as a living body in which the soul can grow. The worth to our children of our special beliefs may be small, but the worth of freedom of mind to seek and form their own beliefs is the greatest gift we can bequeath to them. And we owe this duty not to our private and family circle alone, but to our country. While on every parent and every church devolves the duty of passing on the teaching they deem truest, it is preeminently the obligation of our Heritage (while respecting the liberty of others) never to lend our aid to rivetting the bonds of possible error upon a single human soul.

We have heard the complaint that our Unitarian churches are losing their hold on the young people; and it is sometimes suggested that what is wanted is a more attractive ritual than our services offer. It is, I believe, not so much a High Ritual which attracts young natures, as a High Ideal, and opportunities for carrying out that ideal in practical daily life. The Established Church is recognising this more and more, and enlisting its young members in social and political as well as parochial work. It would be strange indeed if we at the same time were to attempt to revive the old separation between the kingdom of God and the kingdom of this world!

Nothing is too high, nothing too difficult, to set before the young, and the only sure way of losing their sympathy would be for our church to make no demands upon them, to become no longer the rallying ground for the lover of liberty and the champion of free thought. But our religion must dictate our politics—not politics our religion.

The snares and pitfalls which beset our path are many and various. The line of least resistance is so easy to take! Social considerations weigh heavier to day than when all Nonconformists were outcasts from society; the bonds of political expediency hang heavily upon us; the temptation to withdraw from the battle and take refuge in our own insignificance is enormous.

But the eternal verities do not change to suit our changed conditions of civilisation. Faithfulness to conviction is one and the same thing, whether it lead us in one century to face the stake and the rack, or in another to take the unpopular side and speak the difficult word for faith and freedom.

The Principles of Unitarian Christianity.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG, the President elect, then gave an address on "The Principles of Unitarian Christianity as distinguished from its Doctrines." It was a remarkable thing, he said, that although the Association was always spoken of, and quite correctly, as a doctrinal Association, yet its fundamental object was stated in its constitution to be, not the promotion of the doctrines, but of the principles of Unitarian Christianity. By doctrine, they understood some intellectual belief; by principle, some inspiring rule of life and conduct; and however closely the two might be connected, yet they were different things, with different action on their minds and lives. What then were the principles of Unitarian Christianity, he would ask, and what the connection between the principles and the doctrines? To him it appeared that there were certain principles, which, speaking historically, had continuously and consistently characterised Unitarians and Unitarian bodies and Associations from the first until now. The concomitance between doctrines and principles was too constant to be explained as purely fortuitous. It was more than a coincidence. The connection was causal, whether the doctrine was the root of the principle or the principle of the doctrine, or both had the same common root. The concomitance was remarkable and unbroken, and those who knew their history counted on the principles as sure to prevail whenever the occasion arose.

The principles were familiar. First, as principle, stood Freedom, of which they were rightly proud. If they contrasted communities of Unitarian Christians with others, they found as a fact that there was more freedom enjoyed in pulpit and pew and in all their Associations than prevailed elsewhere; freedom which had produced and would produce development and change, and growth of thought on the great and solemn themes presented to the religious consciousness; a freedom which displayed itself in the marvellous absence of friction among their people, differing as they did very widely in actual belief. Ministers of a comparatively orthodox way of looking at things worked happily with a congregation of more "advanced" type, as the phrase is; and on the other hand, oftener, a man pushing forward to new reaches of the truth of God, whose congregation held still to old forms of thought, could yet live with them, and they could enjoy his ministry, without injury or conflict of any kind. That was a remarkable thing, and it was one of the principles of Unitarian Christianity. Another was an absolute and sheer Veracity. All religious teachers, he presumed, had a horror of unveracity. But undoubtedly among Unitarian Christians it was deeper and more often expressed than among most of their orthodox neighbours. Accommodation of mind and phrase, which others would not account an infringement of veracity as a rule, appeared so to the Unitarian, and was regarded with considerable severity. A signal instance of that strong note of absolute veracity they had in Dr. Drummond's lecture on the previous evening, with its faithful deliverance of personal belief, lying between two opposite schools of Christian theology. It might have seemed an attempt at accommodation, but that the truth of the inmost soul of the man appeared, and compelled them to put away any such thought as an insult. And in Mr. Gow's noble discourse it was the veracity, the absolute facing of problems, the absence of any attempt to fit things in comfortably, the acknowledgment of their difficulties, by which they had been so much impressed.

A third principle was in their Open Fellowship, the readiness of the typical Unitarian Christian to enter into religious fellowship with any who would enter into fellowship with them. True, they were cut off by others, and left in the desert; but they did not make the desert. If it were left to them they should make the desert blossom as the rose. A fourth principle was their preference of character to creed. However keen a man might be in the utterance of his own convictions, there was not one on the roll of their Year Book or of the Conference who did not care more whether a man was a good man than whether he held this or that belief. And finally there was among them an unusually deep and widespread sense of civic duty.

Those five were prominent, enduring and universal characteristics and principles of Unitarian Christianity. They were not doctrine; but where Unitarian Christians were, those things were found; and where those things were, they were apt to find Unitarian Christians. They saw it in the history of that Association. He remembered three great upheavals through which they had passed in safety. Away back in the sixties he remembered an annual meeting of the Association at which two venerable leaders, the Rev. Samuel Bache and Mr. James Yates, names never to be spoken without honour, were for having an authorised definition of Unitarian Christianity which should include the miraculous element, that those who could not accept it might quietly disappear from the ranks. There were admirable men among them who thought that right, but the reply of Unitarian Christianity was No, we will not allow such a definition, and the motion was rejected by a great majority. Then, in the seventies, there was a very fierce controversy over the publication of a work of Theodore Parker's, and Unitarian Christianity was again put to the test, but again kept itself open and refused to be limited. So it was again over the controversy whether it was right for a Unitarian Association, being doctrinal, to be endowed with a permanent building. Those were illustrations of a certain instinctive principle which was concomitant with the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity.

The members of that Association were the only organised body of considerable size in that country who might be trusted in time of difficulty and controversy to hold to those great and characteristic principles—and that, although some were inclined, because it was a doctrinal Association, to suspect it of some kind of incompatibility with the principles of Freedom and Veracity to which they were all attached. He did not know which was cause and which was effect, but the doctrines and principles were bound up together, and appeared to be different sides of the one mind which was in them. So, if any such distrust existed on either side, they might well put it away, as a weakening of their action on the church and the world. He who promoted their doctrines was promoting the principles of freedom, veracity and fellowship; he who promoted the principles of their broad religious fellowship, whether he meant it or not, was promoting or tending to promote the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity. Archbishop Tait did not speak unadvisedly when he said that it would not do to free the Church of England, for freedom would inevitably lead to Unitarianism. So to lovers of freedom he would say, Do not be afraid, these Unitarian Christians will never hurt you. Let them be as keen as they will for doctrine, it will only make your broad fellowship the wider and your church of the free freer. And to those who were before all for the doctrines of Unitarian Christianity he would say, Have no fear of those not so keen as you; they are making a field for you, promoting the temper of freedom, the atmosphere of veracity in which you will sow and reap. For himself, he did not know to which of those two parties he belonged. He was sure he belonged to neither or to both, and was inclined to think it was the latter. Let those who put the accent on freedom and largeness of fellowship and those who put it on their wonderful belief in the present love of God and in the human Christ join hand in hand and heart in heart for the promotion, as comrades and brothers, of the blessed kingdom of God.

After Mr. Armstrong's address Mr. THOMAS J. HARDY spoke with great power and feeling on "Sincerity: The Keynote of the New Revival," and Mr. V. TCHERTKOFF on "The Next Step in the Evolution of Religious Methods." These two addresses we reserve for future publication in full.

Unitarianism and Humanism.

The Rev. FRANK WALTERS was the last speaker, and his subject "Unitarianism and Humanism." Unitarianism, he said, above all other forms of religion, secured his love and loyalty because it kept in such close touch with human nature. If asked to define their faith they might begin by saying "We believe in Man," for from that profound faith in man emerged into their consciousness the transcendent vision of an eternal Father and the radiant hope of an Immortal Life. Nor could the terrible facts of sin and shame, which stained the pages of history, destroy their unwavering faith in humanity. They had always kept close to that sublime figure in whom the miracle of personality achieved its culmination of grace and beauty; they had kept in vital touch with the greatest Leader who had ever risen to guide the wandering generations on their way. Untroubled by metaphysical puzzles about the person of Jesus, they fully and frankly laid the emphasis on his simple humanity, as the beloved Son of God and the elder brother of the great family of man. In that sense they were intensely Christian. Unitarianism was a humanistic faith, because it presented in the most unsophisticated form the essential Christianity of Jesus Christ. He was the founder of the religion of humanity and identified himself wholly with man. He affirmed the dignity of manhood, and over the very outcasts from society spread the hands of his benediction, saying: "It is not the will of my Father that one of these shall perish." His devotion to man, even in deepest degradation, was embodied in that marvellous poem of the Prodigal Son, the most humane utterance in the literature of the world. And it was worth pondering how the Kingdom of Heaven, so frequently spoken of in the New Testament, could be adequately described as the Kingdom of Man. The apocalyptic visions were really prophecies of a regenerated earth. The New Jerusalem was to be on earth, a human city; and those who were to enter it were the wearied men and women who had come out of great tribulation—their eyes so blinded by sorrow that they could not behold the Beatific vision until God had wiped away their tears.

Even in relation to dogmas which they disowned their criticism was humanistic. They did not simply deny those forms of faith which had been believed by generations of mankind, and were symbols of living forces in the career of Christianity. To speak of the Trinity as an arithmetical puzzle was to ignore one of the most strenuous attempts to interpret the being of God, and he who saw in the worship of Jesus only a false theology or an ignorant devotion was unfit to deal with the solemn sanctities of struggling souls as they strove to climb to God. In the economy of Providence such symbols were employed at certain stages of the education of the race; but their genesis could be traced, and their providential function interpreted so as to universalise the truths embodied in them. Inquiry into their real significance revealed their human origin. So the Bible was the book of the soul, and the creed a solemn statement of man's living convictions respecting his relations to God. The Church is man's attempt to form a true society, organised by the force of love and founded on spiritual brotherhood; and Christ himself is man—man in his brightest effulgence, manifesting that splendour which is called divine, revealing in his heroic life and death the endless capacity of the race, in which he is the first-born of many brethren. Thus their criticism was animated by a dramatic sympathy with every stage in the unfolding of the Christian consciousness, and even their denials flashed into glorious affirmations of spiritual truth bound up with the very constitution of the human soul. A passion for Humanity, that was the essence of their Unitarian faith. The present age was called by some democratic, and Christian democracy said to the obscurest member of the race: "You are a child of God. You have capacity within you of living a divine life. You have the solemn responsibility of developing your character into moral beauty and spiritual power." Such individual appeal must be the animating principle of their missionary enterprise as Unitarians. The message with which they were charged was the gospel of the sacredness of human nature. Their work was to recognise the mighty hopes, the new enthusiasms, which filled the world, to say to eager souls, listening for prophecies of better things to come, that they could not desire better conditions than those which the great God had reserved for this world in the fulness of time, they could not pray for any blessing too wonderful for the divine Father to bestow upon His children. With faith they might already see that the Kingdom of God was within them, and already they might see the dawning of the ampler day, and tokens of that Kingdom, for which they toiled and waited and prayed, the Kingdom of the Fatherhood of God, because the advent of a regenerated Brotherhood for man.

At the conclusion of Mr. Walters's address, the singing of the Doxology brought the meeting to a close.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Thursday morning the first half hour was spent in a quiet devotional service, conducted by the Rev. H. M. Livens, of Brighton, who gave a brief but very helpful address on the essential spirit of Whitsuntide, an address which we hope to publish next week. This was followed by a Conference, under the presidency of Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., when the following most interesting series of papers on "Types of Religious Experience" were read:—

Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., of Warrington: "Anglican to Unitarian."

Rev. William Wooding, B.A., London: "Congregationalist to Unitarian."

Rev. G. V. Crook, of Taunton: "Methodist to Unitarian."

Rev. Alex. Webster, of Aberdeen: "Presbyterian to Unitarian."

Rev. L. de B. Klein, D.Sc., of Liverpool: "Roman Catholic to Unitarian."

These papers also we look forward to publishing in full from week to week.

At the beginning of the meeting it was announced that an invitation had been received from the authorities for the President to attend at the Coronation in Westminster Abbey. At the conclusion a very cordial vote of thanks was passed to the readers of the papers, with a strong expression of the hope that the papers might be published in a volume.

In the afternoon, the annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission was held at Essex Hall, and in the evening the Conversazione was held at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water-colours, Piccadilly, where the guests were received by the President and Mrs. Odgers, and the meetings of the Association were brought to a very pleasant close.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

THERE were present at the meetings in London during Whit-week representatives belonging to the following congregations:—

Aberdare, Aberdeen, Altrincham, Ashton, Bath, Bedfield, Bedford; Belfast: All Souls, Mountpottinger; Bessels Green, Billingshurst, Birkenhead; Birmingham: Old Meeting, Newhall Hill, Small Heath Bolton, Bootle, Boston, Bradford, Bridport, Brighton, Bristol, Burnley, Bury, Byker, Cairncastle, Canterbury, Cardiff, Chatham, Chester, Chowbent, Cirencester, Clifton, Comber, Crewkerne, Croydon, Derby, Devonport, Dublin, Dukinfield, Evesham, Exeter, Framlingham, Gains-

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

SIR,—The decision of our Committee this year with regard to the children's holiday will, perhaps, cause a certain amount of disappointment.

The prevailing illness in London has made the country mothers most unwilling to receive the children in their homes. With the exception of one or two places, the lady visitors report that the cottagers consider it unwise to receive children from London this year.

Our Committee are of opinion that, even with the strictest supervision and inquiry, the risk would be too great. They, therefore, feel unable to undertake the responsibility, and have decided to discontinue the work for this one year.

Every effort will be made in the following year to start the work with especial care, and with a view to a more efficient supervision. The increasing number of children sent each year has caused frequent difficulty in the selection of suitable homes, and in the securing of capable inspection.

It will be remembered that last summer 120 more children were sent away than in the preceding year. This was a great strain, both upon the finances and the practical arrangements of the work. There remains still a deficit of £30 from last year. And this, with the fact that it is very important to start next year's account with a sufficiently large balance, makes me ask our always kind supporters to send me their subscriptions as before, which I shall gladly acknowledge.

IN GREEN PASTURES.

Not always in a barren rocky place
The soul must toil;
Not always thirsting in a desert space
Must dig the unfruitful soil;
Not always grimly following the chase
Must seek for spoil.

Sometimes no chain of stern endeavour binds
The weary life;
Sometimes the sad heart for a moment finds
A rest when wrongs are rife,
A place of green, where overburdened minds
May cease from strife.

Then amidst deep delightful meadow grass
The feet may stray,
While high across the stainless heaven there pass
White guardians of the day,
And gliding streamlets mirror as a glass
The sun's bright ray.

There we may lie 'neath cool and murmurous shade
In verdant nest,
And dream of all we hoped and longed and prayed
In days of early quest,
And wild desires withheld, or joys delayed,
Not all unblest.

There among pale primroses starlike strewn
Upon the sod,
Where yellow cowslips, sweet as rose of June,
Their fragrant petals nod,
Refreshment brings the heartstrings into tune
With nature's God.

Ah, no, not always harsh captivity
Our mind encloses.
Be thankful that on hills of liberty
Sometimes the soul reposes,
Though life is oft a desert, it may be
A plot of roses.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Chelmsford.—Mr. Aylmer Maude preached on Sunday evening, his subject being "The Story of Jesus."

Horsham.—The Rev. J. Page Hopps was this year the preacher in the Free Christian Church at the 129th annual Whit-Sunday services, in which good congregations took part. The Billingshurst and Ditchling churches were well represented, and other friends were present. About fifty sat down to the lunch, which was provided under Mrs. Marten's superintendence, and over eighty to tea. In the afternoon a meeting was held, at which a resolution was passed condemning the new Education Bill of the Government. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. Dendy Agate, George Lansdown, and J. Page Hopps. Apologies for non-attendance were read from the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland and Mr. Edwin Ellis. The chair was taken by Mr. S. C. Burgess, of Crawley, and the resolution was moved by Mr. Harrington and seconded by the Rev. J. J. Marten. The floral decorations were tastefully arranged, and collections amounting to £5 7s. 6d. were taken for the ritish and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Provincial Assembly.

Horwich.—The annual services in connection with the Unitarian Free Church Sunday-school were held on Sunday, May 11. In the morning the minister, the Rev. R. C. Moore, addressed the scholars, and the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, of Ainsworth, preached in the afternoon on the duties of worshippers to church work and life, and in the evening on "Sunday-school Work; its Needs and Advantages." An interesting feature this year was that in conjunction with these services the building was re-opened after being thoroughly overhauled and beautified. The offertories for the day amounted to nearly £14.

London: Forest Gate.—Re-opening services were held on Sunday, when the Rev. H. S. Perris, M.A., occupied his father's place in the evening. The clean and neat appearance of the Upton-lane Hall, with its harmonious colouring and furniture, gave a new brightness to the service, which was the reverse of dull, in the musical sense, likewise. On Sunday next the Rev. G. Critchley and Mr. Frederick Maddison are to take the services.

London: Highgate.—Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P., has presented a beautifully bound set of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" to the Highgate Hill Free Library, and is adding to his gift, we understand, the forthcoming volumes of the Supplement, which is to bring that great work up to date.

Maidstone.—On Wednesday evening, May 14, the annual meeting of the congregation took place in the Mechanics' Room. After tea and an entertainment, Mr. F. W. Ruck presented the annual report. The Rev. F. Allen, who represented the Provincial Assembly, made a cheering and suggestive speech, and the meeting was also addressed by the Rev. S. S. Brettell. Thanks were accorded to Miss Ellis and the teachers, and to the members of the Sewing Circle, for their excellent work in connection with the chapel. Mr. A. J. Ellis presided.

Parkstone.—There has been a continuance of successful meetings in the Emerson Hall, Constitution-hill. On Sunday week a United Temperance service was held at 3 P.M., at which the attendance was about 120. Evening service was conducted by Mr. Bushrod. On Tuesday Mrs. W. Carter invited the congregation to a social gathering, which proved a very happy means towards closer union. Mr. J. Cogan Conway, of Ringwood, and the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, were present and made helpful speeches.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel (Resignation).—The Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., announced on Sunday morning last that his resignation of the pulpit of Upper Chapel will, by mutual arrangement between himself and the trustees, take effect at the end of the year. Mr. Manning settled in Sheffield in October, 1889.

Shepton Mallet.—Anniversary services were held on May 18, the Rev J. McDowell, of Bath, being the special preacher, and in the afternoon conducting a special children's service.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

RIVINGTON CHAPEL.

The ANNUAL SERMONS will be preached on SUNDAY, June 1st, 1902, by the Rev. Charles Roper, B.A., of Moss Side, Manchester, at 3 P.M. and 6.30 P.M. Tea will be provided in the School-room, between the services, at 6d. each.

SAMUEL JONES'S FUND.

The Managers meet Annually in October for the purpose of making Grants.

Applications must, however, be in hand not later than June 14th, and must be made on a form to be obtained from

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT a meeting of the National Conference Committee, held at Essex Hall on May 20, a cordial invitation to hold the Conference of 1903 at Liverpool was unanimously accepted, and the arrangements were discussed with the local deputation, which attended for that purpose. The first meeting of the Conference, in 1882, was held, it will be remembered, in Liverpool, when the sermon was preached by the late Rev. Charles Beard, and, after a paper by Mr. Harry Rawson, the Ministers' Stipend Sustentation Fund was established. The subsequent triennial meetings have been held at Birmingham, Leeds, London, Manchester, Sheffield and Leicester. At the Leeds meeting in 1888, Dr. Martineau brought forward his "Suggestions on Church Organisation," which were considered at a special meeting of the Conference held in Nottingham in the following year. Next year the Conference will attain its majority, and it is very fitting that the meeting should be held in the city of its birth. Meeting under the presidency of the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter the Conference will receive a report on the establishment of the Ministers' Pension and Inusurance Fund which followed the paper read by Mr. J. Cogan Conway at the Leicester meeting in 1900, and other matters will be dealt with, bearing on the common life of the churches represented in the Conference.

As we write this note a Cabinet Council is being held, and the evening papers are declaring that this is "the decisive moment" and we are "on the verge of peace." It is even hoped that on Friday, the day appointed for the celebration of the King's birthday, the conclusion of peace may be announced. It has been a week of suspense, and if the long hoped-for end is really attained, it will be matter for intense thankfulness, in which all parties will unite, and in which all other differences, acute as they have been, and are, may well, for a time at least, be forgotten. And if peace is indeed assured, may it rid us also of the threatened bread-tax!

A MOST delightful glimpse into the mediæval religion of England and Holland has recently been unravelled and staged by Mr. William Poel, who has this week presented at St. George's Hall the Morality Play entitled "Everyman." The breathless attention with which this tragic allegory has been received is a compliment to all those concerned in its reproduction, and a deeply devotional attitude of mind was produced among the audience. After a tableau in heaven, where the Almighty is enthroned, Everyman, the typical high-spirited youth on earth, is suddenly confronted by Dethe, the mighty messenger, who warns him to be ready to travel on his final journey. Everyman, finding there is no escape, summons his companions Felaship, Cosyn, Kynrede and Goodes, and tries to induce them, one by one, to accompany him, but without success. Being thus thrown back upon his own resources he is comforted by Good-dedes and her sister Knolege, who introduce him to Confession and befriend him to the end. Although the beautiful personifications of Strength, Dyscresion, Five-wyttes and Beaute desert him when his journey leads him to the open grave, these two sisters are present as he descends, and do not themselves die. The impression made upon the audience was profound. The play was produced for the benefit of the Sesame House for Home Life Training.

ON Friday week the General Assembly of the United Free Church of Scotland, meeting in Glasgow, debated for seven hours the charges of heresy brought against Professor George Adam Smith on account of his last book on "Modern Criticism and the Preaching of the Old Testament." Twenty-one years ago Professor Robertson Smith was deprived of his chair for heretical teaching on the Old Testament, but happily the Assembly last week refused by a large majority to give place to the objectors. Principal Rainy led the defence of Professor Smith, vindicating the loyalty of the Higher Criticism to truth, referring to the old controversy over the Creation records, and showing how, when the facts of science were indisputably established, the interpretation of Genesis i. had to be adjusted to the facts. They must, he urged, never be afraid of facts, the ascertainment of which was pure gain. At the conclusion of the debate Professor Smith himself spoke, and had an enthusiastic reception. His views, he said, had been grossly misrepresented. He held, from the bottom of his heart, belief in the Bible as the revelation of God to sinful men, and maintained that criticism had made that revelation more intelligible and more acceptable to many. The votes were 534 for Dr. Rainy's motion and 263 against, a majority of 271.

IT is interesting to note the exact terms of the resolution adopted by the United Free Church Assembly, in the matter of Professor G. A. Smith's alleged heresies :—

> The Assembly receive the report and adopt the recommendation with which it closes, that it is not the duty of the Church to institute any process against Professor G. A. Smith, in connection with his lectures recently published. At the same time the Assembly declare that they are not to be held as accepting or authorising the critical theories therein set forth.
> In dealing with the subject of this report, the Assembly desire to give expression to the unabated reverence cherished in this Church for the written Word, as the lively oracles through which the voice of God reaches His children for teaching, for comfort, and for admonition; and they declare their unwavering acceptance of it as the supreme rule of faith and life. And while they do not feel called upon to interfere with serious discussion of questions now raised, unless the interests of Christian truth should plainly seem to require it, the Assembly call upon ministers and professors who may take part in such discussions to take care that reverence for Holy Scripture should be conspicuously manifest in their writings, and to treat with the consideration that is so plainly due views hitherto associated in the minds of our people with the believing use of the Bible.
> Finally the Assembly recognise that the discussions in regard to the origin and history of Biblical books, which for a number of years have exercised the minds of learned men, have tended to create perplexity and anxiety for many Christian people; yet, recalling the results of former discussions, the Assembly earnestly exhort their people not to be soon shaken in mind by what they hear of statements regarding the Bible, or regarding some parts of its contents. These will in due time be weighed, adjusted, and put in their proper place. Above all the fluctuations of human opinion the Lord rules and overrules: and His Word abides. The grass withereth, the flower thereof fadeth away, but the Word of the Lord endureth for ever.

The reference to "the Word of the Lord" in this connection will naturally be understood by most members of the United Free Church as meaning the Bible, in the old Protestant sense, whereas, of course, the words had in the Psalmist's mind a very different and profounder meaning, in which reverent critics find their complete justification and a source of unshaken faith.

ANOTHER threatened heretic is Dr. Agar Beet, the distinguished Methodist scholar and Professor of Theology in the Richmond College. His heresy appears to be of a very attenuated kind, and much indignation is expressed in the Connection, and especially by his old students, at a suggestion made by a small body of bigots that he should be deprived of his chair. Dr. Beet, in his books on "The Last Things" and "The Immortality of the Soul," would seem to be not altogether sound on the question of eternal punishment. He is said to be neither a Universalist nor an Annihilationist, but he refuses to dogmatise on the subject of the doom of the wicked, finding no clear light in the New Testament. The matter is to come up for decision in July, but it is difficult to believe that at this time of day a representative body of Methodists will on such a ground dismiss a capable and honoured teacher, and a most earnest and successful preacher of the gospel.

FIFTY years ago, in May, 1852, the Western Unitarian Conference was formed at Cincinnati, among the earliest members being the late James Freeman Clarke, and A. H. Conant, that "Man in Earnest," of whom Robert Collyer has written so winning an account. The Conference came to grief for a time over the slavery question, but since 1875 has been vigorously alive again, the centre of gravity having moved on to Chicago, where the fiftieth anniversary has recently been very happily celebrated. Those two veterans, Edward Everett Hale and Robert Collyer, were on that occasion the honoured guests of the Conference and the city.

WHEN a fortnight ago we published a notice of Dr. Brooke Herford's new book, we referred to his illness, by which we are forbidden to hope that we shall ever hear his living voice again; but for the sake of friends at a distance, who do not appear to have realised the extreme gravity of his condition, we ought perhaps to have been more explicit. Since the very serious seizure from which Dr. Herford suffered last Christmas, we have known that any day might bring the news that he had been granted his release, and although in the early months of the present year he did appear to rally somewhat, that has not been maintained. For days together he has been entirely unconscious, and grows gradually weaker. We can simply watch in silence, until for him the light of the new day shall dawn. Friends must realise that their letters can no longer reach him. His children know that in this long watching, which may still continue for some time, or may end at any moment, they are sustained by the affectionate sympathy of many friends.

THE Governing Body of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches have entered on a scheme of work by which it is hoped to renew the zeal and enthusiasm of the churches of the district, and spread the great principles of the Divine Fatherhood and human Brotherhood. The Governing Body offer to visit every church in the district, taking one each month, for a special religious service and public meeting, to be held on Saturday, if possible, and preferably the first Saturday in the month. The campaign is to open on June 7, at Urmston, where the service will be conducted by the Rev. W. L. Schroeder, beginning at 4 o'clock, and the Rev. Thomas Robinson will preach. At the evening meeting, after tea, the Rev. Charles Roper, President of the Association, will take the chair, and will be supported by Mr. Henry Woodhead, of Upper Brook-street Church, and Mr. Henshall, of Urmston.

OXFORD SUMMER SCHOOL.

FOR SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHERS.

THE programme of the summer session for Sunday-school teachers, arranged by the S.S.A., to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, from Friday, July 4, to the following Saturday week, follows the lines which at the meetings in two previous years proved so successful.

The session opens at 10 o'clock on Friday morning, July 4, with a service in the College Chapel and an address by the Rev. James Harwood, President of the S.S.A., and the first hour on each of the following mornings, except Sunday, is to be devoted to an academic lecture, followed in the second hour, 11.30–12.30, by a lecture dealing with the more practical side of Sunday-school work.

The lectures for the first hour are as follows:—

July 5. "Church and Ministry in Early Christian Times." I. Rev. J. Edwin Odgers.
,, 7. "Church and Ministry in Early Christian Times." II. Rev. J. Edwin Odgers.
,, 8. "The Transmission of the Text of the New Testament." I. Principal Drummond.
,, 9. "The Transmission of the Text of the New Testament." II. Principal Drummond.
,, 10. "The Hebrew Prophets." Rev. W. E. Addis.
,, 11. "Our Wealth of Hymns." Rev. V. D. Davis.

The lectures for the second hour are:—

July 4. "The Sunday-school—Failure or Success?" Mr. Ion Pritchard.
,, 5. "Our City Youths and Maidens, their way of thinking and sense of humour." Rev. J. L. Haigh.
,, 7. "The Superintendent's Standpoint." Mr. Howard Young.
,, 8. "Blackboard Illustrations; how to interest our scholars." Rev. T. Robinson.
,, 9. "Right Thinking in Relation to Right Living." Rev. J. J. Wright.
,, 10. "Saturday Rambles as Helps to Sunday-school Work." Rev. T. Robinson.
,, 11. "Music in our Sunday-schools." Rev. W. G. Tarrant.

There will be a common lunch each day in Hall, the afternoons being free, while for the evenings the following announcements are made.

On the opening evening a reception will be given by Principal and Mrs. Drummond. On July 5 and 8 teachers will meet in council. On July 7 "An Eastern Dramatic Poem" will be introduced by Miss Marian Pritchard, followed by a Concerted Reading. On July 8, the Rev. Thomas Van Ness, of Boston, Mass., will give an address on "Travels and Experiences of a Religious Teacher n the Old and the New World."

On Sunday, July 6, there will, as usual, be morning service in the College Chapel, and in the evening a short service will also be held, with an address by the Rev. S. H. Mellone on "The Influence of the Teacher's Personality." On the morning of the last day, Saturday, July 12, the teachers are to meet in council on "The S.S. Code Book."

Invitations to take part in this summer session are, we understand, being sent out this week to all schools connected with our Sunday School Association, and replies are to be sent in not later than June 16. As the numbers are limited to 130, it will be well for those who desire not to miss the opportunity of taking part in this helpful and delightful gathering to reply as promptly as possible.

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

I.—FROM ANGLICANISM TO UNITARIANISM.*

BY THE REV. E. W. LUMMIS, M.A.

THE purpose of this Conference, if I understand it aright, is to enforce the adage that all roads lead to Essex Hall. You who dwell in this haven of the lost have invited wanderers from the four winds, and one wind more, to tell you whence they set out, what went they forth for to see, what adventures met them on the way, and by what stars they were guided hither; possibly, also, what they know themselves to have gained, and whether they fondly imagine that they lost anything by their journey.

The Church a great Society of Worshippers.

The Church of England is a winsome mother, with more than a common power of making her children love her; and those who have felt themselves forced to quit her ministry look back upon her with wistful eyes, not as fugitives, but rather as exiles. To them the Church of England is not merely a department of the State, the creature of Tudor and Stuart enactments; not merely a linsey-wolsey web of ill-sorted theologies, woven in the Erastian loom. She is a great society of worshippers, which by the study and practice of more than twelve centuries has obtained an eminent supremacy in the art of worship. There are two words, stuffed with significance for the religious life, which she interprets better, perhaps, than any of her compeers—the words sanctity and membership. She teaches her sons to be reverent, and she teaches them to be social. Many of you took part in the wonderful meeting in this room a year ago, when voice after voice, in one language after another, gave utterance to the same spirit, and by that one spirit we were all baptised into one body. Those who recall that experience as one of the glittering peaks in their life have but to tell themselves that what they were breathing then, for a few moments, is to the churchman his own familiar native air—that this is what church means to him—and they will understand that it is not for any slight reason that a true churchman will renounce his church. Nevertheless an effort must be made to show you how one and the same quest, prompted by the same unchanging principles, may lead a man first to seek orders in the Church of England, afterwards to lay them down, and finally to fix his dwelling-place among you.

True Vocation to the Ministry.

What is it that a vocation to the ministry necessarily implies? Amid all the mixed motives and conceptions that may go to it there is one fixed and certain element, a sense of the vital importance of religion. If a man looks upon religion as only one among the several aspects of life, to be reckoned in the same list with the commercial aspect, for instance, and the political, then it is plain that he is contemplating religion from the outside. To the religious man there is but one aspect of life. The various kinds of social activity,—barter and government, diplomacy and polemic—are in no sense co-ordinate with religion, but strictly subordinate to it. There is no place where the King's Writ does not run. If this is true of the religious man, it must be capitally true of one who feels himself called to the ministry of religion. To that man religion is not one competitive aspect of life: it is life itself.

What, then, will be the essential character of such a man's religion? What hopes will it excite? What cravings will it promise to satisfy? Some difference will enter into them, no doubt, according to the difference between men and men. The great spiritual emotions, such as faith, reverence and love, and the part played by the intellect, will vary in quality, in degree, and in their several ratios one to another. But amid all this variety there will be at least one constant factor. All these components of a man's religion will be in harmony with his conscience. A spirituality which is immoral or non-moral may be called by various names, but it cannot be called religion. All real religion includes the conviction that virtue is our health and our wealth; that peace can never be attained except through righteousness.

Religion, Life, and the Church's Claim.

But the Church does not present this truth as a bare proposition. She casts a spell over it, works a chymic change in it, gives it transubstantiation out of the stuff of thought into that of emotion and effort. She does not propound it like a professor at a desk, but chants it in an enthusiastic song that follows the sun about the world. In this, and in her mindfulness of the saints and martyrs of old, her doctrine of a unity running through the centuries, the resource with which she multiplies every mode of assertion that can engage or impress—in all this she does well. But she does more. She wraps this central truth in an envelope of other teaching, which she proffers as its firm and final ratification. She professes to unfold the deepest mysteries of God's own nature, to deduce thence His necessary ways of dealing with man, to show these ways written in human history, to penetrate by their light into the darkness of the future; and to these disclosures she does not shrink from adding, like a Hebrew prophet, the supreme attestation, "Thus saith the Lord."

An Obedient Son of the Church.

Now we are to consider a case which need not be regarded as individual, since it must surely be typical. It is that of a man who lends a credulous ear to the voice of the Church. He commits his will to her guidance. His heart is set to obey her commandments, to imbibe her spirit, to use her ordinances. He will soak himself in her teaching, and, if her promise does not fail, he will thereby attain an active harmony of mind, heart, and will, an inward peace that passes understanding. This is his just and reasonable hope, which, if the Church is true to her profession, she cannot disappoint.

His Disappointed Hope.

He begins, then, and for months and years he does his poor best to persevere in that purpose. An imperfect man, a most imperfect Christian, he is at least a loyal churchman. Nor is his service altogether without reward; he gains much from his churchmanship; he learns the meaning of sanctity and of membership; but the great guerdon is not bestowed. At first he attributes his failure to faults within himself; but little by little the impression grows upon him that there is something else, something outside himself, which is amiss. When he redoubles his efforts to lead a true life, even when, according to the witness of his own conscience, he has for a while succeeded, the sense of dissatisfaction is still there. It has been growing gradually, invisibly, like a cloud. It refuses to analyse itself; it is felt as an unhappy presence long before it can be expressed in words. The promise of the Church is to endow her disciples with a store of definite and certain truth, which will afford to the mind an endless pasture of intellectual beauty, and to the will an ever fresh and joyful incentive to righteousness. He cannot see any evidence that this promise is being fulfilled. True, he hears all round him a fashion of language which seems to imply no less; but he cannot blind himself to the fact that this is merely a conventional idiom. In place of evidence that any man has really received the great boon which the Church claims to bestow, he can only find a carefully cultivated assumption that no such evidence is needed.

Unstable Orthodoxy.

In retrospect we may denote his dissatisfaction as a dawning suspicion that the orthodoxy upon which his trust depends is in a state of unstable equilibrium. Instead of standing four-square to the tempest, an asylum for doubters—what if it needs itself to be fenced and guarded? Somehow, below the surface of consciousness, this question is asked; and the answer comes like a revelation. Orthodoxy is not the clear vision which, once seen, is self-evidently final; it is something to be fought for, to be preserved, to be tended. Upon the orthodox is laid the task of conserving their orthodoxy; they must defend it: it cannot defend them.

Our churchman arms himself for this warfare. He turns to the literature of apologetic. These works do not give him what he seeks, for in them he finds writ large the very faults from which he has called them in to clear the Church. They are tainted with artifice; their logic is less evident than their tactic; they make up for assuming just that which he would have them prove by heaping up procfs of the obvious. But they do him one service: they enable him to diagnose his trouble. He now faces the fact that he wants proof of this orthodoxy—this doctrine of the Trinity, this legend of the Incarnation, these marvellous stories about Jesus—not because they are essential to his soul's health, but simply because the Church commands him to believe them; and this second fact, that they are not essential to his soul's health; they are not even relevant to it—they give his will no help in its effort after goodness. They are not an aid, but a task: the heaviest duty which the Church lays upon him is the duty of believing these doctrines.

Authority will not suffice.

To this duty he now seriously applies himself. The way seems long and rough before him, but he hears of a short and easy path across the fields. Can he not accept them on the authority of the Church? She professes to speak in the name of God. If her credentials are sound, there is an end of the question. Whatever she teaches is true. But this field-path, like that which Christian took in the Pilgrim's Progress, belies its promise. The credentials of the Church depend upon the very doctrines which she affirms in her creed. It is to the creed itself that we must turn; if, in the light of human reason, unswayed by any authoritative voice, this creed cannot be upheld, then the magnificent claim of the Church falls also. Not only does her claim fall; she is left in the guise of one who proclaims in the name of God that which God has not spoken. The terrible word of Jeremiah applies to her: "They prophesy a lie unto you. For I have not sent them, saith the Lord."

* A Paper read at Essex Hall on Thursday, May 22, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

So our churchman takes up his creed, and, in the light of human reason—using plain logic, and the rules of criticism which befit such assertions—examines its articles. He begins, let us say, with the miraculous birth of Jesus. He consults no critical books; the Greek Testament is enough. There is but one conclusion to which a candid mind, unbiassed by dogmatic predilection, can come. The evidence on which this portent is asserted is pathetically inadequate. There is no more real reason for asserting the virgin-birth of Jesus than that of Gautama, or Plato, or Alexander, or Octavius, or the Bab, or any member of this Association. We may not assert our belief in that which we have no reason to believe. If any article in a creed is untrue, the creed as a whole is untrue.

The Creed incredible must no longer be recited.

If our churchman is in Orders, the position which he has reached is this: It is part of his daily duty to recite a creed which he now knows to be untrue. What follows? Were there not eminent examples to the contrary, I should have said that his course was plain and inevitable—he must cease to recite the creed; and thereunto he must quit the Church in which he can only retain his membership by continuing to recite it. I am bound to recognise the fact that other men, as good as I, think otherwise; but to me there seems to be no room for doubt or hesitation—he must quit the Church.

Outside the Church, can he rest in Faith?

This issue of his quest cannot but seem to him at first a sheer catastrophe. The great promise of the Church, the glowing hopes which he based upon it, are falsified. He may be pardoned for feeling as if he had staked his peace upon a venture, and lost. It has been an axiom in all religious circles which he has known, that faith cannot stand without dogma. He is like a man who has been taught from infancy to walk on crutches, and now his crutches are forbidden him. But it cannot be long before such a man finds that walking is possible even without crutches; he will go on to realise that they have never been a help to him, but always a hindrance, and that he is happier and more useful without them. If, during this time of transition God sends him a friend, a wise man, kind and strong, who lends a helping arm to his first, unsteady efforts—just the well-judged aid that enables him to keep his balance—he has reason to thank God for that friend. Our churchman discovers that faith can survive dogma. He realises that faith, and nothing else, faith in the Divine Truth, has been his guide through those questionings which have destroyed his former creed. And another discovery, the gladdest of all, dawns upon him. He catches a glimpse of that inward peace, that unforced harmony between mind, will and conscience, which he went forth for to see. So long as he sought it in the Church's way, by coercing his mind into believing this or that, he could not find it. But as soon as he desists from the effort to take peace by violence, as soon as he gives liberty to his own mind to seek truth for itself, and believe only what it finds true, so soon do mind and conscience fall of themselves into harmony. He sees clearly, at length, that orthodoxy in its very nature, the insistence on certain predetermined and necessary opinions, is a foe to peace, because a foe to truth.

Having found Inward Peace, where shall he Turn?

What is he now to do? The craving for society in worship is strong upon him, not only because he has been a churchman, but also because religion is naturally social. But to what community shall he join himself? He can never again belong to any church whose basis of membership is the profession of a creed; yet, as he well knows, this is the general characteristic of the Christian sects. Their creeds are multiform, and endlessly contradictory, yet each insists on the acceptance of its own as the necessary condition of the true religious life. These, then, are not for him. If need be, he will try to form a new community, whose basis shall be free fellowship without subscription to any doctrine—a community of worshippers into which all worshippers, of all opinions, may enter and find a welcome.

Among Unitarians he finds the true Catholicity.

The next step is easy to anticipate. He learns that the churches called Unitarian actually stand upon that basis. The name may arouse his suspicion; he may find it difficult to believe that their open catholicity is genuine and real. But so it is, and so in the end he finds it to be. He casts in his lot with the Unitarians.

Mention must be made of one more experience. He discovers little by little that while the door is really open, and people of widely different views enter unchallenged, and work and worship together, still there exists among the Unitarians a great force of common belief. They are far closer together, even in theology—to say nothing of more important matters—than are the members of the creed-bound church from which he comes. As he reflects on this, his surprise vanishes. The like is true of all sciences which are pursued by free minds in the simple desire for truth. There is a body of common belief among the workers in chemistry and astronomy, in grammar and logic; only in theology is there no settled, common ground: and theology is the only field of knowledge which is still ruled by the method of pre-determination, instead of the method of free inquiry. He has already reached the conclusion that the relation which the Church would establish between creed and conscience is false and wrong. It cannot be made a matter of conscience that certain definite propositions in metaphysics and history should be accepted by the mind, and professed with the lips. If those propositions are such that the mind will ratify them by its own unfettered activity, then the interference of the conscience is unnecessary. If not, it is harmful: not only to the intellect—that needs no urging—but also to the conscience. No man can force himself to believe that which his reason rejects save by debasing, for his own mind, the meaning of truth. He is guilty of the insincerity towards himself which Plato called "the lie in the soul."

Creed and Conscience.

The true relation between creed and conscience is this—that we should make it a point of duty to think as clearly and candidly as we may, to keep our intellect free from the corruption of bribes or threats, and to believe that only which our reason, in its own unhampered working, comes to regard as true. He has already, I say, reached the conclusion that the relation which the Church would establish between creed and conscience is wrong both in logic and in ethics: he now sees that it is impotent to subserve even the one immediate end for which it is intended—namely, to conserve uniformity of belief. Instead of uniformity and agreement, it perpetuates dissension and strife. It encourages zeal for our own opinions, instead of zeal for God's truth, as God shall reveal it. The only ground on which men's minds can ultimately agree is the ground of truth, and the only way to find it is to cast aside dogmatic prepossessions, and listen earnestly to the revelation which is given by the Holy Spirit through our rational powers.

In Unitarianism, then, our churchman has found more than peace for his own soul: he has found a cause which makes for the best good of humanity. To that cause he has dedicated himself; and in its service, with God's help, he will pass his life.

PRINCIPLES AND IDEALS OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.*

BY THE REV. JOSEPH H. WICKSTEED, M.A.

OUR subject this morning is religious education in the Sunday-school, and my particular branch is to be the principles and ideals of this work, or, as I think I will put it, the ideal and the principles which must guide us in seeking it. Now our ideal, as it seems to me, is so simple and obvious that it seems almost unnecessary to name it, for the ideal of the religious educationist must necessarily be to teach his scholars the knowledge and understanding of religious truth. And this indeed we share with religious teachers of all persuasions, for every one of them claims truth as his final goal, but we here are conspicuous amongst them all for our claim that religious truth is to be sought upon the same essential principles as we seek all other truth. In fact the churches this Association is connected with would claim that there is no such thing as specifically religious truth, but that, rather, all truth truly understood is religious. But when we come down, as we must, to the average teacher and the average class, and inquire how this great ideal and the great principles it involves can be brought to bear upon the weekly work of our schools

* A Paper read at the Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Association on Tuesday Morning May 20.

we seem to find ourselves, as it were, at the foot of a great mountain, with rough rocks and deep gorges and tangled forests covering its base, while its clear heaven-soaring summit is beyond our reach, perhaps even beyond our vision.

Learn to speak the Truth.

Let us begin, then, with the least gifted, the worst equipped and most indifferent of teachers, who complains that he has no time nor inclination to prepare his lessons. How shall we advise him to set about the ascent of this mountain upon which he has offered himself—in a rash moment, perhaps—as guide. Now, I am going to advise him to practise himself and instruct his scholars in something which all of us believe we could do if we wanted, and which most of us, though far from having mastered, have yet attained to a certain degree of expert knowledge in—or else we could not live—I mean, speaking the truth. We none of us, I think, can claim to neglect this from want of time or opportunity, and yet I am convinced that by simply learning to speak the truth we are laying the foundations of almost every branch of true human greatness.

First Requisites.

To speak the truth demands in the first place (1) accuracy of observation and accuracy of memory, which are both essential qualities of the scientist, the financier, and even the true statesman. In the second place, it demands (2) the closest reasoning power, to know what exactly it is which our observations prove, and to state that and no more. For instance, when we have read of some event in the newspaper what we know is that we have read it, and it is generally safer to say, "I see in this morning's papers," &c., than to state the fact upon our own authority. Now this practice is not only a necessary qualification for all true scholarship, but the right relating of observation with reasoning is, I believe, the foundation of all true philosophy. In the third place truth-speaking demands (3) a very much greater command of language than is generally supposed (especially, perhaps, in the use of adjectives), and in learning to speak the truth we are practising the art which is necessary for the poet and every branch of literature (even advertisement), and which is closely akin to the powers needed in all other arts. And in the fourth and last, but by no means least place, I would say that to become truth-speakers we need both (4) justice and courage, which are fundamental characteristics of the reformer and the saint. Now I believe that up to the measure of our abilities every one of us may become all of these in our own humble sphere—scientist, financier, scholar, philosopher, poet, reformer, saint—by simply learning to speak the truth. And I believe also that the enormous influence that has been exercised, and is still exercised, in every branch of life by the Quakers is due largely, if not mainly, to the fact that they are such wonderfully fine truth-speakers.

Four Enemies to be Overcome.

But it hardly needs saying that we cannot speak the truth without learning to know it, and to learn to know the truth we need to be inspired by nothing less than a passion for it. For the way of the truth-seeker is beset by enemies within and without. He has, as it were, wild beasts to fight, in his own nature, and unless he is inspired in his pursuit by a passionate love he cannot hope to reach his goal. I will name four only.

First we all know what a savage irrational beast Prejudice is, but though we duly hate it in others we are mostly very proud of it in ourselves, and it is all the more dangerous an enemy for the very reason that it is sometimes a friend and a protector. We absolutely need, all of us, to be equipped with certain moral predudices—and at bottom perhaps most prejudices are moral—but all the more ceaselessly should we therefore be on our guard never to let prejudice, however strong and as we think good, blunt our sense of evidence and reason.

Then there is, secondly, Fear, and even we Unitarians are a timorous people. To take an example from a higher branch of truth-seeking. We often fear, for instance, to really study the life and character of Jesus, lest our illusion be shattered and the greatness of his character discredited. But in this case, at all events, our fears are singularly unnecessary, for the personality which—more or less obscured—has inspired two millenniums of history, and which the Roman, Jewish, Greek, and, I must add, Christian powers could not defame, will be in no danger of dishonour from our most uncompromising fidelity to principles of historic truth.

A third and far more insidious enemy is Indolence. It is indolence which leads a certain class of Sunday-school teacher still to teach the miracles, and the myths of Genesis, as fact—not because he believes them, but because in the first place the Bible is there, handy, and in the second place—as there is no denying—to teach the Bible critically requires both thought and study. But time would fail me to describe the many ways in which indolence in one form or another proves a deadly enemy to the truth-seeker.

Lastly, I will mention Pride as a grievous enemy to the teacher's fidelity to truth. Nearly all of us, I suppose, are inclined to care more for our own ideas than for our scholars. We come with our prepared lesson, all its answers progressively arranged, and when the children persist in giving the wrong answers or no answers at all, we scorn—even if we know how—to investigate sympathetically what is going on in their minds, and we try to force them to say what we have thought—thereby training them to be hypocrites and prigs.

Power of Sympathetic Imagination.

But now having slain, as we will suppose, or at all events subdued, this last foe, Pride, we may begin to ascend the steeper but clearer heights above, where we shall need something more than the qualifications necessary for exactness of speech in describing the outside world of observable fact—for we must now approach the more significant realities of the mind and heart. And to understand the truth about other people's lives, we must not only conquer our native prejudice and our native pride, and the rest, but we must cultivate assiduously the power of sympathetic imagination. For without strongly developed sympathies and sympathetic imagination we cannot possibly judge truly the character, words or actions of any man dead or living. And I take it, therefore, that in the cause of truth-seeking and truth-speaking, if for no other cause, it is one of the prime duties of the Sunday-school teacher to develop early and plant deeply the power of sympathy. Let boys and girls, men and women, yes, animals and even plants, be the constant subjects of our lessons both amongst our older scholars and all the way down to the tiniest little ones. Let the babies hear about creatures they know and love, kittens, rabbits, horses, dogs, and as they grow older let them hear about other children. Let the boys and girls hear of saints and heroes, both the known and the unknown, and the senior classes of teachers and prophets. Let them live in a world of interests akin to their own, but amongst other conditions and surroundings, that their sympathies may be ever strengthened and refined. This one caution only would I give here—let the motives of the characters in your stories be such as can be appreciated by the children themselves, and so far as possible such as can be immediately brought to bear on their own lives. This is the test of a story's value in truth-teaching. Fiction—when told as fiction—may be a powerful agent of truth, if it is true (as we say) to life, and is felt by the child as being true to its life. Narrative of fact, on the contrary, may do irreparable injury to a child's sense of reality by a premature appeal for sympathy to emotions not yet ripe. Tell them Miss Edgeworth's moral tales, which, though always drawing far too strong a line between the good and the bad people, are true to a child's experience and powerful arousers of sympathy and of moral earnestness in children. Tell them the story of Joseph and his brethren—I do not say read, tell—the jealousies, the treachery, the remorse of the brothers; Joseph's own punishment for his pride, his honesty, his success, his family affections and meeting with his old father. These are human stories with much true and child-like humanity in them, which every child should know—as stories. But what can a child understand of the mighty and awful forces which directed the path of Jesus from his workshop to the cross, and which kindled human ecstasy and anguish into the flame of the Christian Church?

Seek Reality, and speak only of that to the Children.

And here I must touch on a point upon which I am aware that I differ from many great authorities, amongst whom I am not sure but what I must number Friedrich Froebel and many of our own Sunday-school writers, and it therefore behoves me to speak very humbly. But personally I feel bound to say that I think many if not most children's sense of the reality of religious truth is irreparably injured by hearing the highest religious verities spoken of before they correspond to anything in their own experience. What is the love of God to a little child, except the warm love of its mother and friends. These human relations are real to it, and it can only know God's love as a reality in what are to it real persons. If you speak to it of a Father in heaven, what can it do but picture a man, perhaps in the sky—or nothing—and in nine cases out of ten, I believe, it learns to regard all religious conceptions as being something less real than the objects of sense, because it cannot yet conceive of reality more real. If only we had faith to wait—knowing that the tangible world of sense seen aright is the revelation of God—until the unfolding mind begins spontaneously to question; and, perhaps, even to hear in its heart the first whisperings of Deity. Then, and not till then, as I believe, will our word on divine things come to children as a revealing light from above waking them to a new world of love and ecstasy. But, as I say, I would speak very humbly on this point, for of this one thing I am certain, that it is a matter of even deeper consequence than that our subjects should be real to our scholars, that they should be real to ourselves, their teachers; and if your own life is God-filled you may be obliged to speak of God, even to the very little ones, and your words may leave a silent, deep impression which far more than pays for any intellectual injury you may possibly inflict. But, at all events, do not let every young teacher suppose that the only way for him to teach religion is to talk about God. I am persuaded that there may be more solid, moral, and religious food in a description of a boat-race or a football match, which is really understood and appreciated, than in the teaching of the highest religious dogma which is despised or unfelt. Above all, we must be real ourselves if we are to teach reality to our scholars.

Truth as to the Sacred Mysteries of Soul and Body.

And so we come to the last and steepest height we must climb upon the mount of truth. We have tried to see how a love of truth should teach us to speak of the outer world of observable fact; we then considered how we must further cultivate sympathy, if we would know the truth of other lives, from the merely animal up to the most nobly human; finally, let us ask how shall our passion for truth guide us in that highest mystery of all, the mystery of our own souls, our own bodies, of the indwelling self and its relation to the Infinite. To guide the minds of our scholars here, surely that must be as teachers our supreme ambition—and yet how hard a thing it is. How can we hope to teach them truly to know themselves? Very few of us, perhaps, are privileged to do much for our scholars just here—at the very point where our true work seems to begin. And yet even here there is one humble task which might lead on to greater things and which we could almost all attempt. If we can only teach them very little, or nothing directly, of the mysteries of their own minds, could we not all teach them a little about the bodily temples in which they dwell? How few young people have any guiding knowledge of the elementary laws of health upon which their happiness, their usefulness and even their righteousness largely depends. And it may be, after years of intimacy and earnest preparation of yourself and your class, that you will some day find yourself privileged—as I have been—to open to your scholars life's deepest bodily mystery and to tell them truthfully all you know of the physical laws and mysteries which brought them into life. This, if wisely and earnestly done—and I would advise no one to attempt it who does not feel the call clearly and even imperatively—if wisely done, I say, this will lead you to a height upon a level with the purest spiritual truths of the inner life.

Mysteries of the Inward Life Divine.

And now to speak a word of those spiritual realms themselves where we are face to face with life's deepest realities and mysteries, as consciousness, death, sin, hope, love; surely our task is not complete till we have helped to guide our scholars here too. But at this point we can no longer teach them, except as their brothers and sisters; ignorant as themselves of eternity and the Infinite, able to prescribe no rules nor formulæ of faith, but telling them only of ourselves, what prayer has been to us, of how the unseen presence has been our support in sorrow and our motive in effort, of how we ourselves have been waked—if we have been waked—by the wonders of nature or the voice of poets, to find in the great universe that brought us into life and mingles mysteriously with our being, no blind unconscious force, but a Spirit human as our own, nay, rather I would say Divine, infinitely beyond even man's divinity, revealed in every living thing, and throughout the universe, and in whom we, too, live and move and have our being.

Truth Unfolded in the Universe.

But now before we descend let us throw one glance back upon the steep path we have tried to climb, and ask what is this way which we call truth. Surely no mere accumulation of ideas or of facts, but a right and living relation between our finite living minds and the living mind of the Infinite. No relation such as that sought by Goethe's Faust, who, having compassed the sum of human knowledge, finally strives to compel the dread universe itself to yield its secret and to become intelligible to his human mind, but rather in the humbler attitude we may all attain by yielding our own minds to receive the impress of Infinity, as our great Wordsworth taught, speaking of

> The discerning intellect of man
> When wedded to this goodly universe,
> In love and holy passion.

Faust, too, would seek in a sense to be wedded to the universe, but he strives to be possessed of it as a man strives to be possessed of a woman's life and love, so that Goethe rightly makes him find at the heart of existence only the eternal woman-spirit. But Wordsworth would make his own mind—if I may say it—the bride of creation, thus finding "in this mighty sum of things forever speaking," the voice, nay, rather the embrace of Deity itself. In Wordsworth's words, then, would I summarise the ideal whether of the humblest or the most gifted of religious teachers:—

> . . . by words
> Which speak of nothing more than what we are,
> Would I arouse the sensual from their sleep
> Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain
> To noble raptures.

THE tissue of the life to be
We weave with colours all our own,
And in the field of Destiny
We reap as we have sown.
Still shall the soul around it call
The shadows which it gathered here,
And, painted on the eternal wall,
The Past shall reappear.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

THE meeting of London citizens to protest against the Education Bill will be held in the Queen's Hall on June 10. Lord Rosebery will preside, supported by the Right Hon. H. H. Asquith, M.P., the Hon. E. Lyulph Stanley, Mr. Lloyd George, M.P., Mr. Sydney Buxton, M.P., Dr. Clifford, Mr. Perks, M.P., Dr. Guinness Rogers, and other representatives of London in Parliament, the London County Council, and the London School Board.

Admission will be free, but there will be a limited number of reserved seats, price 5s., 2s., and 1s., which may be had on application to the Secretary, London Progressive Education Council, Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C.

The following resolution, moved by the Rev. Joseph Wood, and seconded by Mr. A. W. Worthington, was passed at a meeting of the Committee of the National Conference of Unitarian, Free Christian and other Non-subscribing or Kindred Congregations, held at Essex Hall on May 20:—

That this Committee, while welcoming the affirmation of the principle of one Local Authority for Elementary, Secondary, and Technical Education, protests against the Education Bill (1902) for the following, among other reasons:—

1. That by abolishing School Boards the schools of the people are removed from the immediate control of the people, and the cause of Education loses the immense stimulus which arises from periodical contact with the electorate.

2. That the new Education Committee which the Local Authority is to join with others in setting up will not only be removed from direct responsibility to the Public, but is in danger of being largely controlled by the nominees of private and Denominational interests.

3. That the Bill, while providing for the complete maintenance of Denominational Schools out of public funds, still allows them to remain practically under private management, and so violates the first principle of Local Government, that complete support from the rates and taxes must carry with it complete and effective public control.

4. That the Bill, by offering facilities for the multiplication of small denominational schools in districts already amply supplied with school places gives encouragement both to waste and inefficiency.

5. That the Bill, by limiting the rate for secondary education to 2d., which amount in many cases will be entirely absorbed by the transfer of Evening Schools, Higher Grade Schools, and Pupil Teacher Classes from the Elementary School rate to the Secondary School rate seriously hinders the development of Secondary Schools proper, besides unfairly curtailing the power of the Local Authority in the expenditure of its own funds.

6. That the Bill, instead of freeing secular education from sectarian interests, perpetuates and embitters religious strife: (a) by offering a premium to the creation of small Denominational Schools to be set up in rivalry to the people's schools, (b) by importing the religious question into municipal elections, (c) by refusing to free the Training Colleges for Teachers from religious tests, (d) by practically excluding free access to the teaching profession in Schools under denominational control, (e) by narrowing the scope of the Cowper-Temple Clause, (f) by relieving the subscribers to Denominational Schools of the cost of denominational teaching.

OBITUARY.

MISS CURTIS.

THE life of Miss Curtis, in all the freshness of its living sympathies, and helpfulness to so many human hearts, is brought the more vividly before us by the news of her death, which occurred somewhat suddenly at Southport on Whit Monday. The only surviving daughter of the late John Ogle Curtis—for so many years head-master of the Lower Mosley-street Day and Sunday Schools, Manchester—Miss Curtis bore a name widely honoured in educational circles in that city, and beloved and reverenced by many old pupils now scattered over all parts of the world.

Miss Curtis inherited much of her father's sweet disposition, his simple unaffected piety, his love and interest in children. She was thus gifted with a perennial freshness and hopefulness of spirit, made manifest in her unfailing interest in others and her constant willingness to do a kind act or speak a kind word.

On the death of her father, her sick and aged mother became the especial object of her loving care. Through years of strenuous labour she devoted herself to teaching as a profession. She had successful girls' schools in Bolton and afterwards in Southport, many of her pupils attaining to positions of local distinction. After the death of her mother she found a shelter in the hospitable home of her sister and brother-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Taylor, of Ashlawn, Bolton. There she had leisure to devote her matured powers to those religious, philanthropic and educational objects in which she was so deeply interested.

In the special cause of education Miss Curtis laboured for years as a manager of one of the group of Board Schools in Bolton, as also of the cookery classes, and as secretary of the Girl's High School.

Her philanthropic interests raised her to a position of influence as vice-president of the Bolton Women's Liberal Association, and found her serving on the committee of the Society for Befriending Young Servants, and an earnest helper of the Co-operative Holiday Association, for which she acted as welcome hostess at several centres.

Her deep religious life found a sphere of labour in active membership of the Bank-street congregation and as a teacher in its Sunday-school, and subsequently in close association with the Commission-street congregation in the time of its early struggles. In association with her brother-in-law, Mr. Frank Taylor, she made no small contribution to the prosperity of the congregation, now happy in its new home of Unity Church.

About three years ago Miss Curtis went to reside in Southport, taking with her there the same vivid interests and activity of unselfish service. The final summons came to her, as she would have desired, swiftly and unexpectedly, and after a few moments she passed away peacefully and without pain.

The funeral service at Walmsley Church on Whit Thursday was conducted by the Rev. Wilfred Harris, M.A., of Unity Church, and the Rev. E. Allen, of Walmsley, and the words "Seek not the living among the dead, she is not here, she is risen," spoke their message to many hearts.

MRS. HANDLEY.

THE Old Meeting House, Mansfield, has lost a faithful friend by the death on the 23rd inst. of Mrs. Handley. She was connected with the congregation from her girlhood. Her father, Mr. John Birks, was a convert from the Baptists. about the year 1835, when she was eight years old. She grew up a convinced supporter of the new faith. Her husband, the late John Jesse Handley, a leading solicitor in Mansfield, came to share her views and to worship at the Old Meeting. Her son Edwin, who died in 1889, was a prominent member of the choir, and her daughter, Mrs. George Adlington, who survives her, for a number of years acted as voluntary organist. Since her father's death she has been the honoured head of a family very influential in the congregation. In his sermon last Sunday morning on "Influence" the minister, the Rev. Edgar Fripp, spoke of the happy influence of old age on the life of a family and a church, and paid a tribute of high regard and affection to Mrs. Handley, of whom he spoke as a staunch adherent of the Liberal faith, and a true friend of the congregation. The funeral took place at the cemetery on the 26th inst.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Four-footed Hero.

PROBABLY many of the boys and girls who read this "Children's Column" have dear friends among the animals, and know how loving they can be and how grateful they are for a stroke and a kind word. If so, I think you would like to read the true story of a brave dog that was very faithful to his little friend who was in trouble. I saw one evening the scene I am going to tell you about, and ever since then I have looked with a tenderer feeling on those dumb four-footed friends of ours, and have borne in mind how unselfish and generous they can be.

Picture for yourselves a broad, beautiful lake, round which purple mountains rise up into the evening sky. The golden light of the setting sun was brightening their rugged slopes; little waves crested with white foam were chasing one another over the surface of the water, and a flock of tired birds was sailing slowly home—each bird to his sheltered nest. I was standing by the water's edge in the midst of this peaceful beauty, when suddenly a boat put out from the opposite shore, and the men in it, laughing loudly with rough, harsh voices, rowed out into the middle of the lake. Their heavy oars dipped quickly into the water, and at each dip the dancing waves broke into ripples of gold. On they rowed, till, far out in the lake, they lifted their dripping oars, and threw overboard into the deep water two barking, struggling dogs.

One of the dogs was large and had a black, curly coat; the other was small and brown. Both tried in vain to get back into the boat; but the rowers pushed them away into the water. It was plain that if they would save their lives, the dogs must swim to the nearest point of land, and they turned their heads towards the shore on which I stood. Some dogs, as we know, love the water, and to swim in the cool waves when the hot day is over is pure joy to them. But the long struggle to reach land was no pleasure to these swimmers; yet the heartless men cared nothing for their pain, and were bent only on the excitement of the race.

The two companions set out bravely. The men bent over their oars, watching eagerly. By-and-by, the swimmers began to breathe hard, to pant, and one could fancy, though it was too far off to see this, that their eyes were growing dim. Oh! weary voyage, when will it end? How hard it was not to be able to do anything to help the struggling creatures. The large dog, being stronger, could swim faster than the little one, and, at last, as he neared the shore, one could hear him panting heavily, for he was weak and tired out. How fared the little one still far out in the lake? Well, the large dog had nearly reached dry land and safety, when a sound reached him from far across the water. He stopped swimming, and turned round to listen. His small companion was whining for help. Was the little dog so tired that he must drown within sight of shore? What was the large dog thinking as he looked back?

The men did nothing but rest upon their oars and watch. But see! the brave swimmer, only a dog! weary and exhausted, looked longingly to the land, then turned his head again towards his struggling little friend, and straightway began to toil back all the long weary way. He reached the spot in time; the soft brown head was still above the waves.

Would you not like to have heard the little weak, grateful bark, and to have seen the small dog, so faint and tired, climb upon the back of his faithful friend? Back, this time with his burden, came the brave swimmer, but more slowly than before. At length the double journey was ended and both dogs gained the shore.

I wonder whether that brave, good dog had grown into the habit of helpfulness?

Animals, no less than men, need training if they are to grow into heroes, and this dog surely was a hero. Perhaps it had been a custom with him always to help little dogs that were in trouble and to defend them from rough, rude treatment. If so, when that moment of hesitation in the lake came, it would seem natural to him to make the nobler choice and save his friend at the risk of his own life. What beautiful lessons we may learn often from our friends the animals. On the other hand, they watch us in turn with their loving, trusting eyes, and we may teach them much by our example, if we are always patient and gentle with them, and in numberless little ways we may add, if we try to do so, to the happiness of their daily lives.

EVERYTHING in creation has its accomplished and exalted being in the consciousness of man. If the silent waters move mystically, if the murmuring waters murmur peace, if the torrent and the waterfall speak of power, it is only as they flow and murmur through his thoughts. LONDON, MAY 31, 1902.

A CLEAR TESTIMONY.

CONTINUING the report of our Whit-week meetings, we have printed this week the first of the five papers on "Types of Religious Experience," in which the Rev. E. W. LUMMIS tells of the transition from Anglicanism to Unitarianism, and also the Rev. J. H. WICKSTEED's paper on "Principles and Ideals of Religious Education." These papers will tax the strength of those of our readers, of whom we are assured that there are many, whose patience invariably fails them before they reach the end even of the second column of any article; but we would beg them in this instance to persevere, and to undertake the labour of reading these two papers to the end. We are frequently warned, if we would be "popular," not to print anything that runs even into three columns, but we have taken our courage in both hands, and offer this week an INQUIRER which to such advisers must appear forbidding enough; and we shall continue for some time in the same reckless disregard of prudence, for we have thankfully undertaken the task of publishing in due course all five of these papers on "Types of Religious Experience," and there are other substantial contributions, remaining from Whit-week, still to be produced.

To justify this course, if it were needed, we should refer again to Mr. Gow's sermon, published last week. You cannot have a church, he said, based merely on "genial sympathy and fine sentiments." It must have "strong independent faith, and thought and character," and these are not to be had without strenuous effort. Mr. LUMMIS has shown how the true life is to be gained by the way of freedom, and what a glorious thing it is when a man has learnt to walk without crutches, and Mr. WICKSTEED makes us realise how essential it is for religion that we should learn to speak the truth. Others have borne the same clear testimony. Here we simply ask that it may be attended to.

WHITSUNTIDE.*

BY THE REV. H. M. LIVENS.

NOT without a characteristic note has Whitsuntide brought us together again. Tongues of flame have not been wanting, and the Pentecostal speech of true fellowship has proved the unity of the spirit within us. We are one company. Parthians, and Elamites and dwellers in Mesopotamia as we are to one another in some respects, the spirit which has drawn us together and which dominates our counsels is a proof that our own provincialisms of custom and of culture have no real dividing power. As we sit and listen, as we converse together, we hear a high and holy message, every man in his own tongue. We understand one another. Separate though we be as the fingers, are we not united as the hand? Presently we shall be watching with profound interest some of our brethren as they build over again the bridges of thought and life by which from different shores they severally reached the island of our spiritual fellowship in the midst of the waters. How pleasant that island, how grateful the mutual greeting there have not many of us proved! And the union is the deeper, the force of spiritual cohesion is the stronger for drawing us together from remote regions and proving to us our common kinship.

Once in early summer a friend of mine was spending a few days at Selborne. There he met, staying at the same inn, an American who had crossed the Atlantic and made his way alone to the sweet Hampshire village with one treasured hope in his heart—that he might hear the English nightingale and hear it on the very spot where Gilbert White used to listen to it. Next day, therefore, the two men sallied out into the woods together listening for the voice—and not in vain. Their feet were presently arrested. And as under the hazels these two strangers found their hearts beating in unison with the music of this pure joy which the nightingale was pouring into their ears, it seemed as if they had needed to hear this other sweeter tongue before they could understand one another's hearts. Can we utter that magnetic note of concord? Indeed the ancient miracle of Pentecost is working still among us through unpretentious spiritual ways; and the motions of our souls over vital truths, the stirrings within us of great joys and great sorrows, will ever make for harmony among the divided lives and minds of men.

The Pentecostal language which all men understand is the speech of our deep human sympathies. It is a tongue which is spoken in many a clumsy dialect; but even thus it is better than the Queen's English of politest pedantry for getting oneself understood. To cultivate this language and make it heard through all our actions, all our words, is surely the supreme art.

Thank God, the reasonable faith we hold throws no obstacle in our way. Quite otherwise, it helps us at every point. It is a note of the soul's own song which calls us together. That faith must surely help to bring about true social and spiritual harmony among men which cherishes its blessed ideal of human brotherhood—that lamp before the very ark of God which we will trim until its light has become to all men a reality and not merely a symbol—which has broken many a shackle to true thought, and many an oppressive restraint to true life. A faith which refuses to set up a fence round its sacred mount while it needs must use the products of the secular plain. To us the fence is down, and all the land is annexed to the sacred mount.

The sovereign art of sympathy—the Pentecostal grace by which we understand one another, as well as one another's words—ever remains for us to practise and to perfect. To perfect with a finer touch—with more sweet reasonableness in our judgments, with more inexorable patience of brotherliness and sisterliness, with more of that insight which sees our very selves run rank in those we most condemn; and by saving our benevolent deeds and our liberal words from futility by the heart we put into them. Else they are as flowers hastily dragged up and transplanted. They soon wither so. The acts of men, like plants, need the soil in which they grew to be kept clinging to their roots. The heart of man is found by nothing but the heart of man. And through the heart comes the truest efficiency of life. Harvests never ripen save in the sunshine. "The motive force of men is brought to its greatest strength by the affections."

Here then is the medium, here is the tongue which is common to all men, irresistible to all who really hear it, and beyond all things chastening to those who use it. Our hope, our prayer to-day is that across the chasms that gape between creeds and classes and nations the one tongue of perfect human intercourse and of mutual understanding may be heard deeper and more tender even than the song of the woodlands, the language of the love of man for man.

* An Address at the Devotional Service at Essex Hall on Thursday Morning, May 22.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.*

I.

I SHOULD hardly like to say how many years it is since I first began to attend, pretty regularly, the Whit-week meetings. More than twenty it must be, and I have more than an impression on my mind that, within those years, the average attendances have quite doubled, that the number of meetings crowded into the week has about trebled, and that our ideals and enthusiasms have gone up by many, many degrees! Of course, as other "Impressionists" will also say, we reached, as yet, our highest point of success last year when, by the meetings being international, we had a veritable Pentacostal week. It speaks well, therefore, for the meetings of this year when one is able to say that, in spirit and in power, though not in numbers, they seemed to be a good continuation of last year's.

Happily did our week begin with a Sunday-school breakfast at the Holborn Restaurant, where Lady O'Hagan, the President of the Sunday School Association, entertained over 150 guests. The large after-meeting over which she presided should not soon forget the wise, earnest and much-needed words she uttered as to its being the primary duty of the parents to train, or to see that their children are trained in all that makes for the highest character. No church and no system had any right to take this duty to the children out of the parents' hands, and no parents are doing their duty who leave priest or law to do for the children the God-intended duty of parents themselves. Excellent papers were read at this gathering, but the paper which, above all, made an unusual mark, and ought to be read and pondered (and practised!) by every one of us, was that by the Rev. Joseph H. Wicksteed on "The Principles and Ideals of Religious Education." Mr. Wicksteed's utterance was distinctly revealing and bracing to the Sunday-school worker. We did really climb the mountain with him, and it was good to be there.

* We have received from our friends even ampler "Impressions" than are here printed. They will forgive the curtailment which has aimed at securing as much variety as possible within the available space.—ED. INQ.

. . . . .

One thing astonishes me as I look back over the week, and look again over my programme—and that is the very great number of papers, addresses and speeches, together with a lecture and a sermon, which somehow got successively packed into the time and our minds! . . . Nor, of course, am I in the least complaining. I am only justifying my astonishment that so much can really be got in within one week; and, moreover, my greater astonishment, that all these papers and speeches, &c., should be so intensely interesting and good, and all so well attended. No one person, I suppose, voluntarily attends and listens to every one of these papers and speeches, but where all are so good it is a real difficulty to know from which to absent oneself. J. J. Wright.

II.

What a splendid audience! I am not thinking of the mere numbers, but of the close, interested, and, in some cases, the almost painful manner in which the speakers are followed. Breathless attention, worn as the phrase may be, best describes the impression I received. Hunger and thirst for the word of life is the secret of that attention. Particularly was this observable among the poor parsons. Most us have done a fair winter's work. We have been giving out, pouring ourselves forth; teaching, talking, lecturing, preaching for six months without a break, just think of it! Many of our inexperienced laity imagine that it is an easy thing to be a preacher. Let them try, not just for an odd Sunday or two, but say twenty consecutive Sundays in an isolated post, with a morning sermon, an afternoon class, an evening sermon, week after week, and do it conscientiously—keep up variety, interest, follow their authorities in some branch of science, history, poetry, philosophy pretty closely; then I think they would understand the feeling of exhaustion that takes possession of us at certain times, and the great longing for spiritual refreshment; then would they appreciate the recuperative suggestiveness which we find in listening to the strong sons of light who stand before us equipped by careful forethought and wise preparation, and eager to do their best. We want to hear the thrilling voice of an earnest speaker, to catch the play of thought upon his features, to follow the eloquent fingers as they point the moral and adorn the tale. We cannot find this in our books, and that is why speech is so much more forcible to the average man than the message on the printed page.

The note struck by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed at the opening meeting was a clear, ringing one, and it kept its tone and quality through all the gatherings. Our younger prophets spoke with no uncertain voice, our older ones maintained all their well-worn vigour, valour, and inspiration. And nobly did two of the former support the triumphantly glad utterance of one of the most honoured amongst us. I do not mean that there was any preconcerted arrangement; accidentally their message fitted in with his and made the grand underlying harmony and unanimity of the gatherings.

The note struck at the beginning was the power, the glory, the majesty of truth. I have never yet met a man who won an audience more quickly by the sincerity of his manly pathos than the reader of the first paper on Tuesday morning. I say manly pathos, because there was nothing artificial about it: it was earnest, strong and searching. We live in a world of lies and painted bags of wind, and nothing is more needful than to teach the young to be true and direct in their observation, keen in their reason, precise in their language. And then the wonderful delicate way in which the speaker urged his fellow-teachers to make their elder scholars acquainted with the bodily temples in which their spirits dwell, made us all feel that physiology was just as "sacred" as theology, and oftentimes far more necessary. Up the speaker went from height to height in his Way of Noble Virtue, from truth in daily intercourse, in science, finance, philanthropy, to the cultivation of a sympathetic imagination, or into the mystery of our own souls and our personal knowledge of God.

On the same lines notice the grand utterance of the Rev. T. J. Hardy. I waited with a great longing and expectation for this speaker. I wanted to see the man. I have been through every page of his "Confession of Heresy" with my people, supplementing, supporting, illustrating every telling point contained therein, and I knew this man had many another word of inspiration to give to me. Nothing could have been finer than his appeal for sincerity in all the walks of life, but particularly in our craftsmanship. Go down into our common daily life, and let the character of every man be declared in the task to which he sets his hand. Ruskin teaches this, William Morris gladly re-emphasises it, and it is the only gospel of salvation in an age of shoddy.

One of the most honoured amongst us is Mr. Armstrong. Long before he received the King's command he had won his name and fame. On what did he lay the full force of his masterly eloquence? Veracity. There you have the grand underlying harmony of these meetings, the thing which gave them their characteristic vitality—Truth, Sincerity, Veracity.

J. L. Haigh.

III.

In the opinion of the present writer, who has attended twenty-five of these annual gatherings, the meetings this year were rather above than below the average. There was, perhaps, less excitement; there were no burning questions to be discussed; not a ripple of controversy disturbed the harmony of our proceedings. There was one speech with which almost everybody disagreed, but it was well worth listening to, and no one could take offence at it. In former years I remember the education question led to heated discussion and sharp division of opinion, but on this occasion the resolution on that subject was passed unanimously and without debate. This may indicate that we have passed beyond the controversial stage, and have settled down to steady, earnest work. Among the proceedings of the week the place of honour must be assigned to Dr. Drummond's Essex Hall lecture, as a most valuable piece of constructive theology. But the sermon, likewise, was worthy of the occasion. The selection of so comparatively young a preacher may at first have surprised us, but the choice was abundantly justified by the result. The whole service was uplifting and inspiring. A noteworthy feature was the illustration of the way in which "all roads lead to Essex Hall," in the papers read by five ministers who have joined us from five different denominations; it is to be hoped that the suggestion of publishing these papers as a volume will not be lost sight of. I heartily approve of the new departure of securing carefully prepared addresses at all the meetings, and leaving no room for the twaddle of promiscuous discussion. When we come together from all parts of the country, we want to hear our best speakers. There was one omission this year which I greatly regretted; there was no Communion service. The meetings of our National Conference always begin with the celebration of the Lord's Supper, and the same rule ought to apply to our annual gatherings in London.

Edgar Solly Anthony.

IV.

All that was said was good, and some o it splendid, but one wished that there had been more of the baptism of the spirit about it, or, to use another simile, that we should be made to feel that we are sitting down to a feast, and not so much in an anatomy room. The practice of vivisection is not quite banished from our midst, although there were signs at these meetings that it is gradually vanishing. And a blessed day will it be for us when it is completely gone. But it will go only in proportion to our finding a message to proclaim. The man who dissects does so, as a rule, because he has not yet discovered a higher work to do. Dr. Drummond, in his Essex Hall lecture, helped us very considerably on the way to this higher work. It was a welcome utterance, and in season, and I only express the hope that the lecturer will see his way to expanding the last two-thirds of it for us before it is printed. Then there was the sermon, earnest and well-delivered, based on deep conviction. That also was a stimulating utterance, to which we were bound to listen. The preacher gave us marks of a true prophet—humility, and the feeling that God needs us. One felt that the preacher himself had these marks, but one wanted to feel also the other and greater marks of the prophet—namely, that he had seen a vision or heard a voice. The notes of Ezekiel and Isaiah were, "I have seen visions of God," and then they had a message; and the note of Jesus, "We speak that we do know and testify to that we have seen." Or else, the "Word of the Lord came unto me saying," as Jeremiah said; "And the Spirit entered into me when He spake unto me," as Ezekiel put it. The preacher touched upon these casually, but one wished that he had kept to these all through, baptised us with the beauty of the Vision, won us with the wooing of the Voice, swept us off our feet, as it were, refreshed the dry and yawning soil with the dew of heaven. Yet we are deeply grateful for what we had; we only grumble that he did not give us more, which he well could give. Then there were those five papers by five converts, which were exceptionally interesting, especially those of Mr. Wooding and Mr. Webster, who gave us a more living touch than the others, because they gave more clearly the stages of drifting in their own particular cases. Theoretically, perhaps, all transitions are pretty much alike, like all love-tales. but the new and interesting thing is the personal experience. It is this that gives the variety and charm to the treatment of such a subject. Mr. Webster was particularly attractive in his treatment. There was no slow and sleepy movement about it, no heavy thud thud in the delivery, but there were constant light touches which gave rest and relief to the audience.

But perhaps the utterance that has drawn me more closely to it than anything else was that of the retiring President, Dr. Blake Odgers, when he tried to present a definite ideal, and urged us ministers to preach that which we know and not what we merely think, our convictions rather than opinions, our religious beliefs rather than what we can pull to pieces or do not believe in. He reminded us that our chapels were dedicated to the worship of God, and not to the discussion of the latest book, the reading of literary essays, or political harangues. Our work is to preach God, to believe in God and that He loves us; to teach men and women to trust Him and walk with Him; to honour Christ as teacher, leader and guide; and to study, reverence and love the Bible, which has shaped our civilisation so largely and been the instrument in securing and inspiring the desire for civil and religious liberty. This, to me, was the strong note of the meetings. This constitutes a great message.

E. D. Priestley Evans.

V.

Personal receptivity was the sole order of the week, and I am grateful to every speaker, and certainly not less to my host. In every mind, I suppose, was instituted a comparison between last year's "Grand International" and this ordinary meeting. The ordinary stood the comparison well, whether the judgment is made for freshness or value. No doubt the inspiration of the International was still freely flowing, both in the speakers and in the minds of those unthanked organisers who had planned the varied schemes. The canvas was not so great, but the picture was quite as finished. With regard to the cordial meeting of the Sunday School Association I should like to supplement the statement of the untiring hon. secretary about Mr. Hawkes's new book "Simple Talks about Religion." Possibly the Association does not deal in "Catechisms," but I can assure all teachers that if they get Mr. Hawkes's Catechism (1d.) they will add to the great value of the book.

Dr. Drummond's deep "Thoughts" will be most fully appreciated in the study as the "Essex Hall Lecture"; for the significance of the fruit of a life-long investigator is not lightly reached.

The sermon at Little Portland-street was just what such a sermon should be; and it had the effectiveness of the "man" behind it, who desired nothing more than to live it and make it live. The portion that centred round Mrs. Humphry Ward imperatively calls not only for attention but action. Could Mrs. Ward be got to read a paper at the next National Conference? It is the work, the "large," "confident" work that can only be done by associated churches.

The public meeting gave place aux dames (à la dame, at least), and right worthily and eloquently did Mrs. Osler justify the place. The spirit and diction of her speech were alike admirable. I never heard quotations that were more apt, or more nicely dovetailed into a speech. But then Mrs. Osler, it was clear, could have made such "quotations" from within.

Mr. Armstrong's "Five Points" of Unitarian Christianity must be collected—(1) Freedom, (2) Veracity, sheer; (3) Religious Fellowship, (4) Character before Creed, (5) Civic Duty. His tract "Unitarian Christianity Explained" has a quarter of a million circulation; this deserves a million. And in this connection one could wish that speakers, like to Mr. Armstrong, would "look at the clock, Sir." It's an act of heroism, of course, to mutilate a speech, but then sacrifices must be sometimes made for community's sake. Even a Demosthenes would be rightly discounted if he poached. But I do not think he would. Speaking of orators, we have gained one in Mr. Hardy.

Mr. Tchertkoff, if he will pardon this "impression," seemed to be less logical than usual. He deprecates mysticism in religion, but would copy its individualistic methods; he would have social communities, but advocates religious anarchism.

. . . . .

Only in commuity can ever the "intellectual indolence" be made ashamed, or can we achieve "very humbly, but very completely and joyously . . . the work God has given us to do."

H. D. Roberts.

I boldly claim for the future generations of mankind that religion which our best and purest have claimed for themselves when they shall be saints in Heaven. In that state they confess that Goodness and Piety are their own ends—not preparation for any other state of existence. They will become so here. This life will cease to be regarded chiefly as a preparation for another, because it will have become identified with that other. If we are immortal souls, we are immortal here: death is but our great progression; let us begin to live as the immortals should.—William Smith in "Thorndale."

'Tis sorrow builds the shining ladder up,
Whose golden rounds are our calamities,
Whereon our firm feet planting, nearer God
The spirit climbs, and hath its eyes unsealed.—J. R. Lowell.

It is the lifted face that feels the shining of the sun.—Browning.

RELIGION V. THE HISTORY OF RELIGION.

Sir,—Pray permit me to express my grateful thanks to Miss Lucas for the very just development she has given to the idea which I tried recently to lay before your readers. Her quotation from Mr. Charles Wicksteed is precisely to the point. Like him, I say that I am convinced that it would have been offensive to Christ to introduce his name formally into every religious utterance of those who do not identify him with God, but only revere him as the man who most perfectly fulfilled the conditions under which inspiration is given to mortals—the man whose advent was in the life of Humanity what Regeneration is in the life of the individual.

A considerable clearing up of our ideas on this subject may, I think, be obtained by remembering that Religion has in all ages been of two very different kinds—the Worship of Power and the Worship of Goodness. The Power-worshipper naturally looks about for an Intercessor, a Priest, a Medicine-Man, some one to teach him how to propitiate the dreaded Potentate behind Nature; and this Priest offers sacrifices on his behalf (human or animal according to the stage of progress), and, later, performs for him mystic Rites, magic Spells and Sacraments, all of them quite outside of moral duties but supposed to bring with them supernatural favours.

The part of Mediator between man and God tends constantly, in such Power-Worship, to become more important and complicated. Your readers who have visited Naples will recall there the huge picture of the Plague, wherein a priest is depicted as turning from the dead and dying to supplicate St. Januarius; and St. Januarius lifts his hands to St. Joseph, hovering near; and St. Joseph turns to his wife, the Virgin Mary; and Mary turns to her Son; and Jesus Christ, at last, turns to the stern and awful "Padre Eterno" in the background! The picture is a reductio ad absurdum of the doctrine of the Intercession of Saints; but the idea that Intercessors are wanted between man and the All-merciful is a feature never absent from the religion which regards God primarily as the Power who may of His arbitrary will bless us here and hereafter, or else consign us to "most dreadful torments of body and soul in Hell-fire for ever."

When we turn from this Worship of Power to the Worship of Goodness, we find the case, as regards the intervention of Mediators absolutely reversed. The last thing which the true worshipper of Goodness wants is a screen between his soul and God. His whole prayer is to be allowed to come close to God; to bring his sinful soul into the direct Light of the Sun of Righteousness. His hope of purification and restoration lies in meeting the Father's eye. The returning Prodigal does not seek his elder brother and pray him to intercede for his forgiveness, and then announce to him whether and how he can obtain pardon. He says simply: "I will arise and go to my Father."

The core of religion lies in the relation of the soul to God as its Moral Lord, its inner spiritual Guide, Lawgiver, Judge, Purifier, Strengthener, Restorer. To introduce into this Holy of Holies a second Lord—another spiritual Master—a Lesser God beside the Great God, to pray (as I have known pious Unitarians do) to God to "make us obedient to Christ," when they have given up praying to Christ to make us obedient to God—appears (from the standpoint of simple Theism) as almost monstrous; certainly as a practice fraught with spiritual loss and danger.

The ascent from the Religion of Power to the Religion of Goodness was made of old when the prophets denounced the reliance of their people on the sacrifices and burnt-offerings, on the Sabbaths and new moon observances, and proclaimed the eternal verity: "What doth God desire of thee, O man, but to do justice, and love mercy, and walk humbly with thy God?" But though Jesus was the greatest of all teachers of the Divine Goodness, the Christian world yet lingers far behind the Jewish prophet. To hear many modern sermons one would think the preachers had found a text: "What doth God desire of thee, O man, but to go to Church, and attend Early Communion, and walk humbly with thy Priest?" Or of others that the text had been "What doth God desire of thee but to read the Bible, and believe everything in it, and cry 'Lord, Lord,' morning, noon and night to Jesus Christ;" even without doing what he commanded.

FRESH AIR AND GOOD READING.

SIR,—These bright and cheery days bring thoughts of holiday. As we have opportunity, those of us who are fortunate will listen to Nature's wooing by the seashore, in country by-ways, among the mountains. But there are many of us who cannot easily get away from the dreary surroundings of crowded streets. I want to ask my friends and well-wishers to send me small donations to be expended in assisting children, young people and convalescents, who otherwise would be deprived of this great delight, to a brief holiday in the country. Owing to the suspension of the operations of the Country Holiday Fund this year, for reasons explained in Miss Lawrence's letter, many will suffer bitter disappointment. To the extent of the funds placed at my disposal, I shall endeavour to mitigate that disappointment among the children connected with my Sunday-school.

Will you also kindly permit me to state that I am endeavouring to replenish the Children's Library at Mansford-street. A parcel of books has come to-day. Other gifts comprising books of biography, travel, adventure, good stories, fairy tales, &c., suitable for children of thirteen years and under, would be heartily welcomed.

LITERATURE.

PHILOSOPHY AND LIFE.*

THIS volume contains a collection of Essays and Lectures which have already, at different times, been brought before the public. The subjects of which they treat are very various; but they belong together, for they may be regarded as studies in the application of philosophy to various problems of practical life. The author is Professor of Philosophy in a vigorous young University in one of our most enlightened cities. He is already widely known as the author of an introductory text-book of Ethics in the series of "University Extension Manuals," and of a presentation of Aristotle's ethical doctrines in modern form in a volume entitled "Chapters from the Aristotelian Ethics," calculated to be specially useful to teachers. With regard to both of these, we may safely disregard Professor Muirhead's disinterested advice in his "Philosophy and Life": "Do not read 'Elements' or 'Outlines.'"—(p. 18.)

Four of the Essays in this volume are philosophical in the technical sense of the word, as they deal with some of the logical aspects of Scientific Method, and necessarily bring us into contact with some of the most difficult and disputed questions of logical science. The remaining nine are more popular in character, as their titles indicate. "Philosophy and Life," "Professor William Wallace" (as man and as thinker), "R. L. Stevenson's Philosophy of Life" (a very striking and suggestive appreciation), "Abstract and Practical Ethics," "What Imperialism Means," "The Science of Poor-law Relief," "Modern Methods of Temperance Reform," "A Liberal Education," "Psychology and Education." Varied as these subjects are, the treatment of each is full of interest and suggestiveness. The Essays on Imperialism, on Poor-law Relief, on Temperance Reform, seem to us to be models of the spirit in which these vexed questions should be discussed. We do not resist the temptation to quote one or two passages; beyond this, we can only commend the book and ask readers to confirm our words for themselves.

Speaking of public-house [reform, Professor Muirhead says:—

The true line of development is surely in the direction of reinstating the "public-house" in the true sense of the word—the divortium of the ancients—the place of rest and recreation, of diversion and reasonable enjoyment.

After observing that the liquor trade occupies a position to-day of unprecedented strength, he proceeds:—

The inference forced upon us by the recent consolidation of the interests opposed to radical reform, stands beyond a doubt. It is, I believe, that nothing short of the organised action of the community, as a whole, will avail in the future to check the abuses of the liquor traffic. In saying this, I do not wish to be understood as undervaluing attempts (either through agreement, as is being done in Birmingham, or through State action, as Lord Peel proposes) at reduction in the number of licensed houses. I merely wish to point out that when we have done our best in this direction (and I hope we shall not stop short of our best) we shall still find ourselves face to face with a serious problem. We shall still have innumerable houses in our larger cities; each with a larger clientèle of customers; each provided with the means as well as the motive to extend its attractions by a still more palatial glare and glitter over an even wider area than at present.

The first step in the right direction is the proposal—already made in Lord Peel's Minority Report—that the issue of licenses should be controlled by a body more directly answerable to the ratepayers, and, indeed, largely consisting of representatives of the county or city council.

Professor Muirhead takes a hopeful view of the ultimate issue of most of our harder social problems—too hopeful, we fear—when he says:

For the creed, "I believe in the ability and the sacred right of the individual to conduct his affairs in the way best suited to promote his own affairs," we have substituted, "I believe in the right of the community to protect itself against private interests, however powerful, which are hostile to its essential well-being."

The drink traffic is one such interest. And what do we find? From the Prime Minister downwards an unconscious conspiracy of indifference, resting on stolid and immovable ignorance; and against this, innumerable petty temperance crusades conducted by evangelical sects, in whose eyes temperance reform is inseparable from the various gospel pills that they purvey. Sectarian education is another such interest. And when there is a growing consciousness that the most formidable danger menacing our country—not only our industrial interests, but our national existence—is the relative ignorance of our people, we see a so-called Education Bill being blindly pushed through, which will directly strengthen the hold which ecclesiastics have on the instruction of our children.

To support, out of public funds, schools where the education given is notoriously inefficient—schools managed by men in whose eyes it is of more importance to instruct children in catechism, creed and dogma, than to fit them for becoming honest and intelligent citizens—this is our rulers' final conception of the needs of the country!

We could wish that Professor Muirhead had more fully faced some of these darker elements in our national outlook, and some of those tendencies which are hostile not only to the welfare of a nation but to that of the civilised world—of which the most disquieting is the increasing concentration of commercial and industrial enterprises in the hands of a few plutocrats.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE ninth annual meeting of this Association (re-christened last year) was held at Essex Hall on Friday, May 23, and was very well attended.

In the afternoon a conference of Band of Hope workers was held, under the presidency of Mrs. H. Shaen Solly, when a paper was read by the Rev. J. J. Wright on

NEW HOPES FOR TEMPERANCE WORKERS.

Mr. Wright's paper, we are glad to hear, is to be published by the Association, and we must be content here with a very brief abstract. During the last thirty years, he said, there had been a great dearth of Temperance legislation, but at the same time a distinct widening and deepening of Temperance sentiment, touching the very roots of social and individual life. The influence of Bands of Hope on the young had been very great; and among adults the cause had also won its way. Total abstinence, "no drink, no drunk," remained the best remedy, but there were other helps. Even the enormous magnitude of the evil, and the imminent danger it threatened, might be taken as some ground for encouragement, for it had become evident that they were faced by a life and death struggle. The drink bill for 1901 did indeed show a decrease of £2,737,113 on 1900, but it still amounted to £158,154,605, and of this about £70,000,000 was spent by the classes least able to afford it. "The Trade" was organised as a gigantic power in the land, exercising a baleful influence in politics, so that an eminent statesman had referred to it truly as "a political ring which threatens to throttle and control the commonwealth itself." The growing recognition of this danger must give them courage for the future. Thousands of people who were not total abstainers, now recognised the gravity of the situation and were eager in the cause of Temperance. They saw how on every line of progress Drink blocked the way, and notably in the matter of housing. Both employers and employed were coming to recognise how their prosperity was wrapped up in the Temperance cause, and as to this a striking illustration was given from the American "Report of the Committee of Fifty" on the legislative, physiological, and economic bearings of the liquor traffic, showing how widely in America, in great industrial undertakings, the use of intoxicants is strictly forbidden to the employés, and how the men themselves in their unions are increasingly on the same side. The awakened spirit of reform in great municipalities such as Liverpool, Birmingham, and Glasgow was also noted, and particulars were given as to the diminution of licensed houses and convictions for drunkenness in Liverpool. Something had also been gained by the recent Act as to the sale of intoxicants to children, and the Government's Licensing Bill held the promise of real improvement. Hope was also to be gathered from the earnestness with which Lord Peel and Sir William Houldsworth had thrown themselves into the cause, and from Earl Grey's "Gothenburg" experiment; also from the influence of successive Commanders-in-Chief on the same side. The Archbishop of Canterbury had well said that while the Temperance cause moved slowly it had never gone back on the progress made. They had indeed as yet only convinced a few that the principle of total abstinence was right, but it was only seventy years since the "Men of Preston" began the crusade, and the cause of sobriety had certainly made great advances. Temperance workers had good reason to be encouraged and to press on, co-operating with every power, local or national, that made for safety, sobriety, and self-control.

In the discussion which follwed Mr. T. Pallister Young, Mr. Frank Atkins, of the Band of Hope Union, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, F. Allen, and W. G. Tarrant, Mr. J. Breddall, the Rev. C. Hargrove, and Mrs. Solly took part. More than one speaker dwelt upon the connection between fresh air and temperance and the cultivation of wholesome tastes, and in connection with the coming Coronation festivities it was urged on all Temperance workers to use their influence to prevent the use of intoxicants at feasts given to the people. The use of more than one schoolroom, it was said, had been refused to authorities who would not accept that condition. One far-seeing minister, without raising that question, had suggested a tea instead of dinner for the old folks, and his suggestion had gladly been adopted. Mrs. SOLLY, in bringing the discussion to a close, emphasised the value of the pledge, which acts like the rope binding Alpine climbers together. If one slipped the others held him up.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Wright and to the chair was passed on the motion of Mr. F. A. EDWARDS, seconded by Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR.

THE EVENING MEETING.

At the annual meeting after tea the chair was taken by the Rev. H. G. CHANCELLOR, vice-president, who gave an eloquent address, making earnest appeal to Unitarian laymen to throw themselves into the work. Only about sixty of their churches had any Temperance organisation, and their Association had only 118 individual members, but all ought to be united to meet that most insidious foe of their country. He moved the adoption of the report, which had been read by Mr. J. BREDDALL.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG seconded the motion, and gave an interesting account of what the Liverpool Unitarian Temperance Society hope to accomplish by the establishment of a Temperance public-house, and also of what had been done by the Liverpool Vigilance Committee in making the magistrates realise their powers and responsibilities under the present laws. A healthy rivalry had arisen between the Vigilance Committee and the police as to which could effect most in the cause of reform.

The report having been adopted, the Rev. C. HARGROVE moved the election of officers and committee, and told the story of his own conversion to total abstinence, which, he said, had fortunately happened before his visit to America. The motion was seconded by the Rev. T. J. JENKINS, supported by Miss SPENCER, and unanimously adopted.

The Rev. R. H. GREAVES then moved, and the Rev. G. V. CROOK seconded, a resolution in favour of the Government's Licensing Bill. This was supported by Mr. Montford and unanimously passed. After a vote of thanks to the chairman, moved by the Rev. J. J. Wright and seconded by Mr. T. P. Young, the Doxology and Benediction brought the meeting to a close.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union was held in Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, May 22, and was largely attended. The chair was taken by Miss M. C. GITTINS, of Leicester. Other delegates of affiliated Postal Missions present were Miss Dowsing (Birmingham), Mrs. Farrington (L. and S.E. Counties), Miss Alison Hall (Liverpool), Mrs. Manning (Sheffield), Mrs. Rogers (Portsmouth), and Miss Spencer (Southampton).

The report was read by the hon. secretary, Miss Florence Hill, and the accounts were presented by the former treasurer, Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies, who is succeeded in that office by Lady Wilson. A cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Davies for her past services, and of good wishes for the future in her new home, was passed towards the close of the meeting.

The report stated that the total number of new applicants for literature was 2,110, as against 1,967 the year before, and that 1,635 old correspondents remained on the books; 1,733 theological works had been lent during the year. Particulars were given of the work of the Central Society, and special reports from nearly thirty affiliated societies were added. The special interest of the visit to the Unitarian churches of Hungary was noted, and the good progress of the Suffolk village mission.

The cost of the Hungarian journey for twenty-seven persons was £412 15s. 10d. The Suffolk village mission account of £174 11s. 10d. was balanced by drawing £13 19s. 10d. from the general fund, the salary of the minister being £120. Towards the general account of £114 14s. 10d. subscriptions amounting to £87 10s. 6d. were received, and donations of £8 15s. 3d. It was stated that an additional income of £30 was needed for the Suffolk village Mission.

Miss GITTINS, in moving the adoption of the report, congratulated the Central Society on the success of their work. It was work amply justified by the gratitude of correspondents, expressed in many touching letters. Season by season the husbandry of God was going on, and they saw the fields whitening for the harvest. It was their privilege to have some part in that husbandry, and it was indeed a mighty trust. Sometimes they were allowed to see some fruit of their labours. They must thank God and take courage, and do what in them lay to hasten the coming of His kingdom.

The resolution having been seconded by Miss SPENCER and supported by the Rev. W. JENKIN DAVIES, who gave some humorous reminiscences of the Hungarian journey, Miss TAGART also spoke of the significance of their visit to that country, particulars of which she had embodied in a special report.

She recalled the great awakening which came to European nations in 1848 and the troubled time which followed, and told of the straits to which the Unitarian College at Kolozsvar had been brought, to the relief of which she and her father had gone in 1858 taking the money contributed by English Unitarians. The college then rescued from extinction had recently outgrown its old buildings, and it was to the opening of the splendid new buildings last year that their party had gone. Unfortunately they could not stay for the actual opening ceremony, which had to be postponed, but nothing could exceed the warmth of the welcome they received, and both they and their Hungarian brethren had been strengthened and encouraged by thus meeting together. Miss Tagart then spoke of the hard work of the Hungarian ministers, on whom, in addition to daily services in the country churches, the care for the education of the children largely fell. They had many hardships which were cheerfully borne, and there was inspiration in the example of their courage and devotion. The present movement Los von Rom was far-reaching and of great significance in Austria. While it made towards Protestantism, the life and thought of Unitarianism seemed to be penetrating everywhere. Miss Tagart also referred to the work in this country and congratulated the minister of Boston on the brave stand he had taken against the gambling habits of the town.

Mr. V. TCHERTKOFF then gave an interesting address, expressing great sympathy with the work of the Postal Mission, so different in character from the missions with which in his early years he had been brought in contact, and telling of work which he had formerly done in Russia, in connection with the endeavour to raise the standard of literature circulating among the people. That had brought him into contact with many seekers of light, and he gave touching instances of what men had to endure on that account. The pamphlets they had now translated into Russian, from Channing, Parker, Armstrong, and others, were published by the help of the B. and F.U.A., but, owing to the censorship, they could not be circulated as widely as they wished, nor could they know fully of the effect produced. But he told of one man, a peasant, who, from the independent study of the Gospels, had refused military service, suffered exile, and in Siberia had met with some Doukhobors, with whom he spent six happy years. Then he fled to Russia to see his friends again; and was now in this country, on his way to join the Doukhobors settled in Canada. He had welcomed the broad view of religion expressed in those pamphlets. Much help could be given by the sympathy of man for man, and from the depths of his soul he wished them God-speed in their work.

Mr. V. R. SHINDE then spoke of the success which had followed a first attempt at Postal Mission work by a friend of his in Bombay, telling of the extreme reticence of his people on religious subjects, so that the quiet appeal of the Postal Mission to people in their homes was the best that could be made. He pleaded that Unitarians and Brahmos should be regarded as one people, as they were united in the one spirit of religious life, and in India and England were doing a common work.

Mr. Z. TOYOSAKI also gave an interesting account of the welcome given to Unitarian thought in Japan, and the spread of the liberal religious movement in that country. There also the Postal Mission promised to be of great service.

A vote of thanks to Miss Gittins, moved by the Rev. H. WILLIAMSON, brought the meeting to a close.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT NURSING HOME.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of Winifred House was held on Monday afternoon at Dr. Williams's Library, the chair being taken by Dr. ELIZABETH GARRETT ANDERSON.

Miss MARIAN PRITCHARD, hon. sec., in the absence of the treasurer, Mr. W. M. Blyth, presented the statement of accounts, and also read the annual report.

The accounts were in a satisfactory condition, although the balance of £127, with which the year began, was reduced to £91, on a total of £826 14s. The grant from the Hospital Saturday Fund had been increased from £10 to £35, a most welcome mark of public approbation. The subscription list had been well maintained, but during the present year four large subscriptions had been lost through death, and those vacant places should be filled.

For twenty-two years, Miss Pritchard said, she had been writing the reports, first of Mrs. Hampson's Home, and since 1880, of the Memorial Home. The eleventh year of their Invalid Children's Nursing Home had shown very good results. Forty-eight children had been cared for in the Home, and during a third of the year the whole of the nineteen beds had been occupied. An inroad of chicken-pox had somewhat reduced the average, but happily they had escaped any more serious infectious illness. The long spell of fine weather last summer had been of the greatest help, so that the children were able to spend the whole of their time in the open air.

Among the year's gifts was a delightful boat swing which had been placed in the garden; a word of special thanks was added to Mrs. Henry Rutt, who, on giving up her house, had sent an abundant store of useful and welcome things to the Home.

They felt it to be admirable work, to build up health again in the little sufferers and send them out fit to take their place in the world, and those who had a share in the work were filled with joy and gratitude at the continued well-being of the Home.

Dr. GARRETT ANDERSON, in moving the adoption of the report, expressed the great pleasure she had found in a visit to the Home. She had been struck by its truly home-like character, the great cheerfulness which pervaded it, and the absence of suffering in the children's faces. She was charmed to hear how much time the children spent in the open air, and had been greatly surprised at the smallness of the expenditure, but certainly the children were well fed and cared for. It was good that so much as £160 was paid on behalf of the children. It was of great importance that those who benefited by the Home should contribute, and thus gain a deeper interest in the good work.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, in seconding the resolution, dwelt on the importance of such work, in the midst of the vastness and ceaseless perplexity of their city life. People were apt to think that only some great scheme could effect what was needed, but often the best help was rendered by the smaller efforts, such as that Home represented, bringing love, brightness, and joy into the sad places of the great city.

On the motion of Mr. T. PALLISTER YOUNG thanks were accorded to the committee for their past services, and they were reappointed. On the motion of Dr. URBAN PRITCHARD, seconded by the Rev. W. WOODING, the honorary medical officers and the lady superintendent were thanked for their services. Dr. Pritchard spoke especially of the success which had attended the treatment of mastoid cases, requiring very patient and careful nursing, which reflected great credit on the lady superintendent.

A vote of thanks to Dr. Garrett Anderson, moved by Mr. IÒN PRITCHARD, brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal.

London: Rhyl-street.—May I be allowed to call attention to the state of my Poor's Purse account on page 40 of the London Domestic Mission report and to say that the figures on the debit side got transposed? I had, therefore only a balance of 30s. on hand at the end of March last. That being so, may I plead for contributions to it for this new year? The piano I spoke about on page 38 of that same London Domestic Mission report has not yet come along.—William Wilson, 5, Claremont-road, Cricklewood, N.W.

Atherton: Chowbent Chapel.—A member of the congregation here, who presented its minister, the Rev. J. J. Wright, with the latest edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," in twenty-five volumes durably and beautifully bound, has now offered him the additional eleven volumes, which are about to be published as the tenth edition, completing the ninth and bringing the "Encyclopædia" entirely up-to-date. Such a work is a library in itself, and no more helpful present of books could be made to any of our ministers.

Blackley.—The anniversary services were held on May 11, the preacher for the day being the Rev. Charles Peach. In the afternoon the choir, assisted by friends from Oldham-road and Strangeways, gave a good rendering of the cantata "Earth and Heaven." On Whit Sunday a large number of scholars, teachers, and friends attended the united service in the Free Trade Hall. During Whit-week the usual festivities were observed. On Friday the members of the school and chapel walked in procession, according to custom, returning to school for tea. After tea an interesting event took place. Mr. Knott, who has retired from the office of chapel treasurer after a period of more than sixteen years' service, was presented with a handsome silver tray as a mark of esteem and appreciation of his work. The presentation was made by the Rev. W. Holmshaw on behalf of the subscribers, and Mr. Knott suitably responded. Happily, although Mr. Knott has resigned the office of chapel treasurer, he and his family remain as valued members of the congregation.

Choppington.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary services were conducted by Mrs. John Tweedy, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. Special hymns and recitations were given by the scholars, the church being prettily decorated with flowers. At the evening service the church was crowded with an attendance of about 170 children and adults.

Devonport (Appointment).—Mr. G. L. Phelps, of the Home Missionary College, has accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of this church, and is expected to enter upon his duties on July 20.

Evesham.—On the 26th inst. the spring meeting of the "Monthly Meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and the neighbouring Counties" was held at Evesham, seventeen ministers attending. The Rev. E. A. Voysey, B.A., of West Bromwich, conducted the service and preached the sermon. Afterwards the members of the Evesham congregation entertained the ministers to luncheon in the school-room, about sixty being present, the Mayor (Mr. Councillor Hughes) presiding. Later in the afternoon the luncheon party and other members of the congregation were received by Mr. and Mrs. Geoffrey New at Greenhill Park.

Leeds: Hunslet.—A resolution strongly condemning the Government's Education Bill was unanimously passed by the congregation after evening service last Sunday, and copies of the resolution have been sent to the Duke of Devonshire, Mr. Balfour, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, and Mr. Lawson Walton, member for the division.

London: Little Portland-street Chapel.—On Sunday last the services were conducted by the Rev. W. Jenkin Davies, of Belfast, whose discourses were much appreciated. The minister (the Rev. H. S. Perris) announces the following subjects for the forthcoming Sunday mornings of June:—June 8: "The Heritage of Englishmen;" June 15: "The Education of an Imperial Race;" June 23: "The Kingdoms of the World and the Kingdoms of our God;" and June 29: "The 'Mighty Trust' of Empire."

Manchester: Goulden-street Ministry to the Poor.—On Whit Saturday the Rev. B. Walker took seventy children and adults connected with his meeting-room to Sale Lodge, where, through the kindness of Mrs. James Worthington, they spent a very happy day.

Rawtenstall (Appointment). — The Rev. Jenkyns Thomas, of Pendleton, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to the pastorate of this church, and will commence his duties on the first Sunday in September.

Saffron Walden.—For several weeks past the General Baptist Chapel has been undergoing renovations and structural additions. Lighting and drains have been seen to, the ceiling has been made sound in places and renovated, the interior walls have been scraped and flattened; the exterior of the chapel has been cleaned and coloured, and a new porch has been erected over the front entrance. On Sunday, May 18, re-opening services were held, when the pastor, the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, preached in the morning, and in the evening Mr. Thomas Bond, of Portsmouth. The services were continued on Sunday, May 25, in the morning by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth, and in the evening by the Rev. W. Harvey Smith, of London. There were good audiences and good collections.

Stannington.—The anniversary services were held on May 25, when two excellent sermons were preached by the Rev. G. Street, of Buxton. There was a large congregation in the afternoon, and in the evening the chapel was crowded to its utmost capacity. The collections were in excess of last year. Special hymns and anthem were sung by the choir and children of the Sunday-school. Great credit is due to Mr. G. Vickers, the organist, for the way in which these had been trained.

Tavistock.—A most successful United Band of Hope demonstration took place on Wednesday, May 21. The Abbey Chapel Band of Hope numbered fifty members. The procession was over a mile long, and upwards of 3,500 children walked. The ministers of the town all took part. In the evening a mass meeting was held, the Town Hall was densely packed, and an immense crowd in the Square formed an overflow meeting. It was one of the most remarkable Temperance demonstrations ever held in the West of England.

Warwick.—The ladies of the congregation, subscribing together, have presented two handsome brass vases to stand on the Communion-able. These will be used for the flowers which are provided every Sunday by various lady members of the church.

York.—In the Yorkshire Observer of Saturday, May 24, there appeared an account of the service at St. Saviour-gate on the evening of Whit Sunday. The account was the eighth of a series under the heading "Church and Chapel in York."

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

RIVINGTON CHAPEL.

The ANNUAL SERMONS will be preached on SUNDAY, June 1st, 1902, by the Rev. CHARLES ROPER, B.A., of Moss Side, Manchester, at 3 P.M. and 6.30 P.M. Tea will be provided in the School-room, between the services, at 6d. each.

UNITARIAN CHAPEL, DEVONPORT.

This Congregation is making a great effort to secure the Freehold of their Church, in order to free themselves from a yearly charge of £15 15s. for ground rent. The opportunity of doing so on favourable terms now exists, but on the decease of the present landlord (who is over 70 years of age) it is doubtful whether equally good conditions will be offered. The effort has been approved by Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and is warmly supported by the B. and F. Unitarian Association. The sum of £57 has already been raised by the members and their friends, but as the congregation is mainly of the working class, it is impossible to raise the whole sum required (£337) without generous outside help.

The following contributions have already been promised in addition to the £57 already mentioned:—

F. Nettlefold, Esq.	21	0	0
Sir John Brunner	21	0	0
Sir E. Durning-Lawrence	21	0	0
B. and F. Unitarian Association (cond.)	21	0	0

Help is asked in raising the balance of £200. Further information may be obtained from the undersigned, who will also gratefully acknowledge any donations.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"PEACE and Good-will; Good-will and Peace!" So the Christmas bells rang out, constraining Tennyson even in the first year of his bitter sorrow to new hope. And so, late on Sunday evening, long after the time of any curfew, we heard in the heart of Surrey distant village bells, and knew that it must mean Peace! "Peace and Good-will," for so indeed we may hope for the future from the considerate and generous manner in which peace has at last been made. Terrible sacrifices have been made on both sides in this tragic conflict, and it will require the most strenuous and patient efforts of our best men, if the sacrifice is not to be in vain. But if those who are to do the work of the new settlement in South Africa will learn of the men who on both sides have fought so bravely, and know so well how to be generous also as friends, we may yet see a happy issue out of all the misery of the past three years.

THE war has cost this country £228,000,000, and more than 22,000 men, besides many thousands more or less seriously disabled, and this is only a part of the price that has been paid. What the Boers have lost we cannot estimate, but we know that when the 45,000 prisoners are brought home again, and the people gathered in the concentration camps, numbering over 100,000, are restored to their own land, it will be with many heart-breaking memories of thousands who have fallen in the field or perished in the camps. No generosity can be too liberal in helping to restore their shattered homes, and it is with the utmost satisfaction that we see the terms that have been granted. That peace would bring an immediate relief of taxation has proved to be a vain hope, for the Chancellor has declared that he must retain both the bread-tax and the addition to the income-tax; but for making a lasting peace we shall have a better heart to pay.

THE rejoicings over the conclusion of Peace must not be allowed to divert attention from the gravity of the conflict involved in the discussion of the Government's Education Bill. On Monday the House of Commons went into Committee on the Bill, and has since been engaged in discussing various amendments on Clause I., which constitutes the new local education authority. Every amendment proposed up to Wednesday was defeated by a large majority, but the consideration of the clause was not completed. Mr. Channing's proposal to postpone the consideration of Clause I., and Mr. Lambert's to confine the Bill to secondary education, were the first to be dealt with. In the course of subsequent discussion, Mr. Balfour explained that in his view the local council would be not only the rating authority, but would have practical control over the education committee, which would therefore not be an absolutely independent education authority as had been supposed. If this view can be practically maintained, it would seem to bring the authority a little nearer to popular control than the constitution of the committee promised. The Government have shown themselves deaf to all appeals from the friends of School Boards.

SPEAKING at a Church Defence meeting last week the Archbishop of Canterbury expressed a desire that in the matter of the Education Bill Nonconformists should be conciliated. Churchmen, he said, would be ready to consider, when the Bill got to work, anything they could reasonably do to modify what Nonconformists felt to be a grievance. But it is the essential principle of the Bill that is the fundamental grievance. In their view public schools supported out of the rates must be under popular control, and cannot justly be dominated by one religious sect. The present Bill, unless it is radically altered in Committee, cannot bring any final settlement of the question of religious instruction; and if it "gets to work," as the Archbishop hopes, and as the Government appears to intend, it will only be a signal for a still more determined agitation against the unjustifiable privileges of the Established Church.

THE meeting of London Citizens in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening, to consider the Education Bill, promises to be a very strong demonstration of the Progressive opposition to the Bill. The chair is to be taken by Lord Rosebery at 8 o'clock, and the speakers, as we announced last week, will include Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lyulph Stanley, and Mr. Lloyd George.

CORONATION DAY.

"ART thou a King?" the haughty Roman spake
In bitter irony and cruel scorn,
Across the boundless gulf which seemed to break
'Twixt the Patrician and the lowly-born!

"Art thou a King?" to-day the lowly-born
Ask the Patrician, proud of blood and race!
"Hast thou the sacred marks that must adorn
A King by right divine of truth and grace?"

"Art thou a King?" No chrism of holy oil,
No priestly hands, no gorgeous pageantry
Can make thee King! No unction can assoil
If aught which is not kingly sully thee!

Nor jewelled ring, nor priceless diadem,
Nor orb and sceptre, silk and ermine fair
Can make thee King! but touch the garment's hem
Of Christliness, and royalty is there.

If thou be King, a Shepherd must thou be
To guard the flock and keep the lambs from ill:
So thou must go where they may follow thee,
And, as they follow, may revere thee still.

These are no days for vain and empty show!
Thy people need a Man to rule their hearts!
Let others make the paths by which to go;
Win thou the love which willingness imparts.

Thy Coronation is not here and now;
'Twill come when thou art gathered to the dead,
If then thy stricken people lowly bow
With grateful soul and sorrow-laden head.

If, when that solemn pageant passes by,
And funeral dirges tearful voices sing,
"Edward the Good!" a million voices cry,
Then art thou Crowned: then art thou proved a King!

H. W. HAWKES.

THE AKUREYRI DISASTER.

WE published on May 10 a letter from the Rev. M. Jochumsson, of Akureyri, acknowledging the help of English friends, sent to Iceland through THE INQUIRER, in relief of the distress caused by the disastrous fire last December.

In a further letter, dated Akureyri, May 7, Mr. Jochumsson writes :—

"Once more I am obliged to post my English letters overland, as the ice still continues blockading both the northern extremities of our island. A new hope for relief is just dawning, however, as the ice winds have given place for warmer weather.

"As to your generous letter enclosing the cheque for £100, it arrived only a week ago, and as I failed in getting its value in cash here, I send it now to Reykjavik, still having a month to wait for its soul and substance! In the meanwhile, I have been able to negotiate so far by the help of it, that our really suffering people have been supplied with their nearest necessities. But although I have succeeded so far, an Englishman of business—if he were a literary man also—might well feel inspired to write a new 'Story of a Dollar' upon hearing the adventures of your said cheque! Indeed, we Icelanders shall never become formed or reformed into the likeness of the rest of civilised Europe till we have been relieved from our old enemy the ice through a new system of roads over the inland mountains, or by motor-cars—not to forget Marconi's wireless wonder! So far has the world moved, however, that this present condition of the northern half of our island is universally felt as quite unbearable—viz., an ice-blockade lasting three or four months, putting the half of our entire population on the verge of starvation. No enterprise, implying capital, will pay till that arctic feature of this otherwise mild and interesting island is more or less neutralised.

"Allow me, dear Sir, still a few words more congenial with the chief aim of your truly Christian paper. As to liberal Christianity, I really doubt whether there exists outside your own country another people less spellbound by Church dogmas, or more given to independent reasoning than ours. Dear brethren, even one of your least prophets might do good work in Iceland, and especially in these northern districts! How often have I been yearning to see here a Unitarian of a similar character as was my lamented friend, the late bright and excellent Mr. R. Spears! Or if we were to hear some of your best lecturers here, as the late Mr. Fletcher Williams. Be sure they would get the most hearty hearing, both at Reykjavik and Akureyri, everywhere—only a creditable interpreter would be necessary."

Mr. Jochumsson then sends a message of warm greeting to Mr. Armstrong, who, after his visit of last summer, and the letter which prompted our Relief Fund, is "one of the most popular Englishmen in Iceland," and describes what might be done if one of our representative men could visit Iceland this summer. That, we fear, can hardly be arranged; but we are glad to hear that there is some prospect of a Scandinavian student, who has been studying for the ministry in America, spending next session at Manchester College, Oxford, who would then be a far more effective missionary among his own people than one of us, who must perforce speak through an interpreter. Meanwhile, if any of our friends should think of visiting Iceland for a holiday they will see that the way is prepared for them for a most cordial welcome among that Northern people.

WE recorded recently the happy completion of the Baptist Twentieth Century Fund of a quarter of a million, and it appears from the final report of the Congregational Fund, the promoters of which aimed at half a million, that this also has in a manner been secured. The amount raised by the Congregationalists is in fact much more, being £710,724; but the greater part of this has been raised by the churches for their own benefit, for the payment of debts and for the extension of their own premises. For the Central Fund only £83,121 has been raised. Malcontent critics, therefore, are inclined to say that the Twentieth Century Fund was a failure, and that the greater part of the money for local church extension, &c., would have been raised in any case, quite apart from the Twentieth Century movement. This the champions of the Fund deny, and are thankful for the impetus it has given to the work and life of their churches.

THE Indian Messenger of May 11 published a list of donations to the Building Fund of the Brahmo Girls' School, Calcutta, on behalf of which Mr. Ion Pritchard recently made an appeal in these columns. Mr. Pritchard, it will be remembered, was able to send over £200, as the gift of English friends. The Calcutta list amounts to over £1,600, the donations ranging from Rs. 2,000 to Rs. 5 and smaller sums, the Lieut.-Governor of Bengal, Sir John Woodburn, giving Rs. 100. The original appeal, signed by distinguished representatives of the Brahmo Somaj in Calcutta, spoke of the sum of not less than £3,500 as being required to complete the building scheme, so that there is still ample room for generous gifts from friends of the higher education of women.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Faith of an Agnostic; or First Essays in Rationalism. By George Forester. This book comes from "The Rationalist Press Association," of which that veteran champion of many a good cause, George Jacob Holyoake, is the chairman. In one sense of the term most thinking men are now Agnostics, although they would hardly call their negations, or their inability to believe, "the faith of an Agnostic." All wise men acknowledge that it is very little they can know of the mysteries of God; and that the Infinite cannot be comprehended by the finite. But that is entirely consistent with profound religiousness, and by no means involves the denial of God, or the assertion that, granting His existence, we can know nothing about Him. We confess that we have no desire to controvert the somewhat dogmatic statements of this able treatise. The initial mistake of books of this kind is that they fail to recognise the fact that man is a complex being, and that the instincts of reverence, aspiration after the ideal, and faith in unseen realities which are common to the universal religion of humanity, are as much a part of his nature as the purely intellectual faculties. And it is further to be borne in mind that no great and permanent good comes out of mere negations. (Watts and Co. 5s.)

One Hundred Sonnets, by W. V. Burgess, is prefaced by an essay on the Sonnet's history and place in English verse, which shows the author an enthusiast for that form of poetry. The Sonnet he calls the "Monograph" of poetry, which illustrates the axiom, as in the scientific monograph, that "not by length but by strength is real thought measured." The same view is expressed in one of the sonnets :—

What is a sonnet? Can it be defined
As this, or that, or several things combined?
Is it "surge and resurge" as some would say,
Or does it but dexterity display
Of words and rhyme?
This poem fourteen-lined,
Shakesperian or Petrarchan, was designed
To hold in miniature some genius-ray
Of happy thought, or feeling grave or gay.
At best, it is an uprush from the mind
Of one idea subliminal, that may
Not bear diffusion, like the idle wind
Of fancy, but brief in sonnet limits stay
Poignant and subtle—art with thought entwined,
Terse, deep, condensed, laconic poetry.

That may be taken as a fair example of the author's skill in this form of verse; but we do not think that he has realised how much is demanded in the Sonnet, in the matter of form, to ensure success—even in the most "irregular" sonnet. Many of his lines we have found it very difficult to scan, and in some of the sonnets, so far from the strength of a terse monograph, we have found only fragments of thought and questioning, which left no satisfactory impression. Earnest thought and true feeling for Nature are not by themselves sufficient to make a poet. Mr. Burgess's prose volume, "Hand in Hand with Dame Nature," will, we think, be generally found more attractive. (Both books are published by Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes, Manchester.)

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

II.—FROM CONGREGATIONALISM TO UNITARIANISM.*

BY THE REV. WILLIAM WOODING, B.A.

THE responsibility for this somewhat halting title I leave with those whose desire of uniformity has obviously played a trick on their critical faculty. Congregationalism denotes a democratic form of church life and polity, in which respect it stands in no sort of contrast with Unitarianism; and so far from being a convert from the principles of Christian democracy, I am to day as much a Congregationalist as ever. Yet I find myself very happily domiciled amongst the Unitarians; though I am not sure how far, had they been sought, I should have won the suffrages of the general body at the time of my first appearance amongst them. But, for something over twenty years, I have been the minister of one of the oldest of your London churches, and now, in these last days, I have undertaken almost to write my own obituary, and say, as briefly as I can, how I, an evangelical Congregationalist, have come to be what and where I am—the minister of a Unitarian church. I offer my apologies for a story that has none but a personal interest, and for reminiscences that must be drawn from the limbo of some thirty years ago. To reach so far back involves a considerable effort of illusive memory; and it is quite possible that some elements of more recent years may unduly intrude.

College and First Ministry.

To start, then, at the beginning, I was trained for the Congregational ministry at Spring Hill, now Mansfield College, Oxford. After a residential course of six years, I was, in 1866, elected to the Castlegates Church, Shrewsbury; and in 1870 I surrendered that pastorate under the pressure of change in theological opinion. I have long since destroyed my youthful sermons of College and Shrewsbury days as having but little retrospective interest, and still less of intellectual validity; yet with the aid of a few notes, which are all the memoranda I possess, I think I can fairly-well recall the general course of events that led to my retirement, and perhaps call up a ghost of that mental activity which issued in theological collapse.

I think it was in the year 1869 that I was induced to attempt a course of lectures on systematic theology. Naturally, I was not going in for original investigation. But I had been drilled into a certain mental attitude in College; my notebooks of professional lectures were fairly-well stocked, and subsequent reading had, for the most part, followed the well-worn lines of thought. So that it was not without some confidence in my equipment, and certainly without any anticipation of the issue, that I undertook this fateful course of lectures.

Religious Unrest.

You will, perhaps, remember that the period to which I now refer was that in which the religious world was being profoundly agitated by such epoch-making books as Lyell's "Geology" and Darwin's "Origin of Species"; and general scientific treatises were to me always vastly more attractive reading than the commonly accepted books on formal theology. I do not remember that the latter were neglected; but the former were a fascination—too great, perhaps, for their bearing on theological questions to be duly appreciated. Now, a man may be so on the alert against any direct attack on his creed as to be equal to an immediate and successful defence; or he may stand at ease in fancied security, and have his position turned by unsuspected forces. I do not remember having been in any way disturbed by the works of Priestley, Channing, or Theodore Parker, nor even by those of the universally revered Dr. Martineau. The latter was felt to belong to the Church Universal, and many a soul was refreshed by his writings who never dreamed of yielding to the claims of the creed or church he was supposed to represent. Indeed, the influence of these and such writers was being almost completely overshadowed by that great change in the common intellectual atmosphere of society which reached its climax in the immediately famous doctrine of evolution—that orderly and gradual unfolding of all that now is, from a past which, however remote, is separate from the present only by imperceptible gradations of change. The lucid exposition of natural phenomena, by a whole galaxy of brilliant scientists, and their splendid illustrations of law and order, in place of primal chaos and cataclysmal change, were a revelation from which I have never turned, and in respect of which I have never suffered more than momentary perplexity. Once for all, I learned to look upon the world of to-day as the natural resultant of foregoing conditions, and presently observed laws as none other than those which have all along prevailed, beyond all human or other record.

Evolution, a solvent of Orthodoxy.

Now it is quite possible that such thoughts may be held for a time without any perception of their far-reaching significance. But should they become fixed mental foci of the consciousness, they must from that moment begin to affect the whole orbit of thought. With me their application might have been longer deferred, had I not undertaken to give form and coherence to the thoughts of other people. For, of necessity, I must set my own in order; and yet, under the conditions of unforeseen change, I could be only a few steps in advance of those I was essaying to instruct.

The views I set out to represent were, in general, those that then formed a sort of preface to the "Congregational Year Book." They were held to be a mere consensus of opinion, Calvinistic in type, and accepted only in various parts and degrees by the ministers and churches of the Union. Confessedly they were binding on none; but having been, on a memorable occasion, reaffirmed for purposes of discipline, they must, notwithstanding a continued disclaimer, be held to have surrendered their purely voluntary character. They have, however, been removed from the preface to an almost unnoticeable appendix—a fact significant of much, in the light of more recent years.

But to return to my Shrewsbury lectures. On looking through my scanty memoranda, I find myself reasoning in the usual way on the question of the Trinity—not very strange considering the text-books I used, and their latest annotations in the college lecture-room. Accepting the suggestion that human nature must be, so far forth, an image and expression of the divine, I argued that the distinctions of the ego and the non-ego must apply to the divine as to the human; and that personality with its social emotions must be, as it were, the shadow of something kindred in God. I could thus feel my way to a quasi-divine society, or some hypostatical difference which, so far as the finite may bear any relation to the infinite, should afford ground for the conception of the plural personality of the divine nature. Only on the supposition of such distinctions could I frame to myself the notion of creation and the inauguration of changes such as causes and their effects in time and space. Thus, in fancied security from Sabellian heresy, I could follow my masters in the acceptance of a divine trinity in unity. But what afterwards proved a serious difficulty was that the separate functions of these august personalities melted into each other. I could hold them as mental distinctions; and even to-day I have no quarrel with trinitarianism as a conceived mode of being, but their separation is so unstable and fugitive, that in trinitarian worship where the creed is not most carefully formulated there is the most invincible tendency to confuse the persons or divide the substance.

The Inspiration and Authority of Scripture.

My first open departure from orthodoxy appears to have been on the question of the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures. I could not determine in what it consisted, nor find anything short of inspiration itself by which the matter could be put to the proof. It seemed that the doctrine had been produced, partly under the influence of metaphorical speech, and partly from the felt necessity of finding some standard of truth, or some court of final appeal in theological controversy. I concluded that, if there were any reality with which it might correspond, it could be none other than some intuitional capacity for reading the spiritual behind the sensuous screen of Nature—a power that must surely vary with the person in whom it was found. It could therefore be no special feature of national story or plane of culture; nor would it be likely to exempt the most liberally endowed from possible or actual mistake. I thought that the writers of the Scriptures were transparently honest men, but not beyond the pale of reasonable criticism. Nor, even on the supposition of their original infallibility, could I appreciate the usual guarantee for their inviolable tradition. The most important question respecting them was to discover their actual meaning, free as possible from all later adulteration; and then test that meaning as to its truth and validity by all available means. Further than this I could not go; but it was a principle that might lead far, when the time should be ripe.

The Scheme of Salvation a Stumbling-block.

What really proved my theological undoing was an examination of the Scheme of Salvation. You must not forget that I am now speaking of one who, thirty years ago, was intellectually much younger than his years; and that many things were then held for certain which, though retained in articles of faith, no longer form any part of a reasonably well cultured man's mental furniture. I had no difficulty about the divine origin and fall of man. I could distinguish between the legendary form of the narrative and the unquestioned truth it conveyed. The real stumbling-block was Paul's use of these legends. I reasoned somewhat thus:—Here is a pair of child-like innocents, left to contend alone with the craft and subtlety of the devil, of whose inimical existence and presence they seem not to have been aware. Now Paul seems to imply that the fall of these creatures was part of the divine intention; that not otherwise could man's spiritual life reach a stable condition. Be this as it may, to say that such a fall was sin, worthily punishable by death, and further involving all future generations in equal guilt and death-worthiness, was an appeal to notions of justice that could belong only to a very low phase of human society. I held, with the Rev. Mr. Dobney of Maidstone, that if the creature were responsible to his Creator, the latter, in the exercise of His creative power had also incurred a responsibility to His creature akin to and more permanent than that of a father to his offspring. The potter, indeed, is not responsible to the vessel he has made; but man is no such vessel; and at times the question is as inevitable as natural, "Why hast thou made me thus?"

In short, I may say, that from this point onwards the whole structure of scholastic theology began to crumble; the sand on which it was built began to shift, so that its ruin was but a question of time.

Still, human sin was real, and real also the need of help. But then Salvation can surely be none other than moral and spiritual health, with the recovery of which juridical schemes and legal conventions can have no vital connection. If human sin were a mere technical status, a conventional remedy might be enough. But it is so real, and so involved in the very texture of his being, that no man can tell where responsibility begins or ends. And so far from there being any need of elaborate forensic preliminaries as an excuse for the exercise of divine forgiveness, and the bestowment of heavenly grace, there would seem to be more clearly needed a justification of the ways of God for the condition in which man finds himself. It might well be that, in order to realise a divine sonship, man must of necessity pass through and out on the other side of a sinful condition; but that surely only argues the fitness and the justice of his claim for all the help that is needed for his deliverance.

What of the Incarnation?

Now all this had a very distinct bearing on the doctrine of the Incarnation. Cur Deus homo? asks Anselm. Why, indeed? For the part assigned, in the scholastic scheme, to incarnate deity could have no grounds in reason, and, therefore, none in fact. There might, indeed, be other and valid reasons for the theory of an incarnation, whether conceived as taking place once for all, or as in some non-Christian theologies, repeated at intervals; but for that demanded by the schoolmen, which should offer a satisfaction for broken law, and an inducement for a hardly obtainable divine forgiveness, I simply held that the causes did not exist for the sake of which these superhuman and juridical functions were postulated. Whatever incarnation might mean, supposing it to have been a fact, its object could be nothing analogous to ransom, propitiatory death, or vicarious sacrifice. Even atonement could have no other meaning than that of bringing the human into harmony with the divine will. I do not say that such an aim was not worthy of incarnation, but that was not what the schoolmen claimed as its meaning. So then Jesus might be the Christ, might even be a divine incarnation, but there remained for him no non-human functions to discharge, and even as to the fact, his divinity could be established in the judgment of men only by applying those standards by which the higher types of men are tried.

Yet this in no sense affected my conception of the Trinity. I thought then, and still think, that this doctrine has none but an accidental relation with Jesus of Nazareth; that it would probably have been formulated through the interaction of Greek and Hebrew thought, had Jesus never risen above the Jewish horizon.

From Doubt to New Convictions.

I need not pursue these matters into further detail. Those who have been educated under more natural conditions can hardly appreciate the shock and strain of such a break in traditional faith. The dreary blank created by the removal of so much that was customary, and comfortable because customary, was painful beyond expression. Nor, unless I were fairly sure of the issue, would I willingly expose another to the dangers attending it. But, strange to say, I do not remember that it ever occurred to me to pray for deliverance from the cumulating doubts that, point by point, were undermining the formal faith I had heretofore held. I have heard of men, in what I must believe to be similar conditions of unrest, wrestling with their doubts: I have marvelled at their hardly-won peace of mind, some in the recovery of their disturbed faith, and others through the reinterpretation of the old formulæ: but I could not pray myself back again to the peace from which I had parted; I could only wish to be sincere and unsoiled in personal truth, and to possess a hardihood that should be undisturbed at the prospect of painful consequences. The rest that came to me was a faith that had no conflict with reason or ascertained fact. Revelation was no longer to be perceived solely in a single line of narrow local national life, but in the wide scope of a providence that encompasses all things in its abiding order and lawful embrace. The sonship of Christ was but the pledge and assertion of the common sonship of humanity, and Salvation was the infinitely varied healing of the sinful and sorrow-stricken heart of man by a love that knows no bounds, and needs no forensic excuse for its exercise.

The Reasonings of Friends.

I was not without friendly advice in the trying circumstances to which I have referred. I received much kindness from the late Dr. Dale, an honoured senior alumnus of my own college. Said he, "Don't insist too much on negation; deal as much as you can in affirmations, and error will fall away like last year's withered leaves." Ah! but I had denied, and perhaps in greater measure than I had affirmed; nor could the emphasis with which this had been done now be modified. Not that I specially desired it; for, in frankly saying all one's mind, negation and affirmation must surely go together; and a man may have some excuse in feeling that affirmation had long played too large a part in Christian theology.

There was, of course, much pain in the fading of personal friendships; and none so great as that which was caused by the evident grief of an aged tutor who, to help me and if necessary see me righted, came from the college to talk matters quietly over. The good man now rests in God, and his memory on earth is fragrant of manifold kindnesses to his students; but no act of his long life was kinder than that which brought him one winter's day, to place at the service of a crude and somewhat impulsive young man the ripe wisdom and experience of age. Had I been amenable to advice, I had surely been influenced by that right reverend father in God. "Hold on," said he, "yet awhile, and let these perplexing questions rest." I remember the anxiety with which he sought to include my statements within the compass of accepted dogmas; how eagerly he emphasised our points of agreement and minimised our differences; but when I asked whether he really thought the usual terminology had the same meaning for us both, the pain that came over that dear old face was something to remember, and something which, assuredly, I do not forget. Of pain such as this there was no stint. The turning away of fellow-students and brother-ministers who had shown me some honour, and of elders who had set some expectations on me, was not very lightly to be borne. But of that acute distress which is usually associated with doubt, I knew but little.

Often, since, have I been thankful that at this critical time I was not embarrassed by the personal ties and responsibilities of family life. Whether, under such conditions, I should have proved faithful to the simple claims of duty, I know not: how far these things have affected and do still affect other men, in similar circumstances, I cannot tell: I am glad to remember that I was not so sorely tried; and I reckon my escape no small part of my good fortune in those strenuous times.

Severance from the Church.

Meanwhile, I had in my own charge the Church Roll, which was prefaced by a copy of the trust deed—modelled on that which the Congregational Union still suggests, and sometimes enforces. I was, therefore, not ignorant of the conditions of my service; and it was now impossible to conform to its requirements. No one, indeed, reminded me of it; and on my resignation there was no want of unanimity in desiring that I would let the matter rest for a year, to see if, with recovered health and a more temperate pursuit of study, I might save themselves and me the pain of a separation. This was done with such trustful kindness that I could do no other than make the trial. The effort was, however, in vain. In a few months I again resigned, resisting the not unusual suggestion of secession with a view of founding another church on a broader basis, retaining my private membership until I had helped to install my successor, when I left Shrewsbury and, as it proved, the Congregational ministry.

Meantime I sought and obtained congenial work in teaching, thus gaining time for further reading and reflection. Occasionally I preached for friends, who, though almost ostracised for their divergence from traditional beliefs, yet remaided the honoured ministers of important churches. But I neither sought nor in any way expected to find any sphere of ministerial work outside the ranks of Congregationalism. I do not remember that the thought ever occurred to me. I was most sincerely attached to the churches for whose ministry I was trained, and I had no other ministerial associations, except that during my residence in Shrewsbury I had made the acquaintance of the Rev. Mr. McKee, the Unitarian minister of that town. This acquaintance ripened into lasting friendship, but, as the lawyers say, without prejudice; for it implied no special theological agreement; it meant no more than the courtesy of an elder towards a young man, and a strong attraction of the latter towards one so much above himself in character and intellectual culture. We had many friendly discussions on the questions that separated us, and he was especially kind and sympathetic in my theological collapse; but I am not aware of any other effect on me than the simple pleasure of kindly intercourse without pretence of intellectual agreement. Leaving Shrewsbury I remained for some twelve years without pastoral work.

The Leicester Conference.

If, however, I had any kind of expectation that the conditions of ministerial service in the Congregational body would change in my favour, such hope was entirely removed by the issues of the famous conference held in Wycliffe Chapel, Leicester, in the autumn Session of the Congregational Union of 1877. "The innocent purpose of this Conference," writes my friend Mr. Picton, whose own future was also vastly involved therein, "was to ascertain the minimum of theological agreement necessary for spiritual communion. The conclusion, obviously commending itself to the greater number (of the special meeting called for its discussion) was that no theological agreement is at all essential. In other words, that people holding the most diverse views may sincerely worship and work together: character is the true test; yet agreement is not to be secured by fussy inquisition. Generally, we proposed to rely on the natural working of selective sympathies."

Alas for such truly catholic hopes! At the next meeting of the Union in the following May in London, after an eloquent and extremely noble defence of his position in a professedly free and undogmatic community, Mr. Picton was excluded from the Union; the previously mentioned articles of faith were reaffirmed, and declared to be the recognised creed of the Congregationalists. And thus, for one of the ablest of their preachers, a devout Christian and profound philosopher, no place could be allowed in the church of his fathers, nor in the society of his brethren.

A New Opening for Service.

Meanwhile, I remained fairly happy in my obscure tent-making; availing myself of such opportunities of service as were presented by a diminishing circle of friends, but fully resolved to accept no pastoral settlement except under fairly free conditions. So things remained until the autumn of 1881, when, to my utter astonishment, I was invited to preach at Newington Green, and in the following January to become the minister of that church. The surprising thing was that I could not then, nor for some years afterwards, allow myself to be called a Unitarian. Not for any objection I felt towards the name, but because I took it to stand for ideas which I did not then, and in some measure do not even now, entertain. Perhaps my friends understood me better than I did myself; at any rate, the name stood for liberty and forbearance at Newington Green, and it does so still. I thank those good friends for their patient tolerance of an attitude in their minister which, to say the least, must have been somewhat trying. But owing to those intellectual changes of our time, which are more potent than the personal struggles with the perplexities of individual life, our differences have shrunk to smaller dimensions, and our agreements have proportionately enlarged, until we meet in what may be called the New Unitarianism; which I do not define theologically, but regard it as offering to its adherents the widest spiritual and intellectual freedom; and to the world, an evangelism of a depth and fulness of meaning such as to reduce the earlier content of the word to insignificance.

On the occasion of my settlement at Newington Green, I was reminded that I had not been quite overlooked in my long obscurity. My name was removed—I do not say improperly so—from the Congregational Roll, though I was taking no steps to qualify myself as a member of the Unitarian denomination; and, except for a little personal controversy with some who now felt justified in their previous distrust, I thenceforth ceased even my nominal relations with the Congregational body.

For the Freedom of the Spirit.

It would be idle to say that I now stand where I did some twenty or thirty years ago: I were thus unworthy of any place in a world where knowledge grows from more to more. But in an altogether unobtrusive fashion, and without seeking any recognition beyond that of the Church which has honoured me with its generous confidence, I have laboured in the full persuasion of the absolute unity of truth, and in the sole authority of reason in things moral and spiritual. I believe in no mysterious arcana into which the reverently seeking mind, if it be able, may not penetrate. Nor do I allow that any person, however exalted, or scripture however sacred, can authoritatively override those personal convictions which are lighted up by whatever of the divine may quicken and chasten the human soul. But, because to get into sympathetic touch with the master thoughts of the wisest and most spiritual of our kind is the noblest means of our enlightenment, I will be proud of that religious and intellectual home that calls no good man a stranger, and offers a generous welcome to all who seek the Eternal in spirit and in truth.

LITERATURE.

LEADERS OF RELIGIOUS THOUGHT IN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.*

THE great need of Religion at the present time is for intellectual backbone. This holds especially of "Liberal Religion," which is now tending to lose itself in clouds of vagueness. Once deemed the most "intellectual" of religious movements, it may yet become the least worthy of that distinction. Its advocates are too fond of dwelling on the "beauty," or, as the phrase often runs, "the simple beauty" of their ideas. The Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man is described as a "beautiful faith." But that impresses nobody, strengthens nobody, convinces nobody. Teaching so conveyed is, we contend, in a decadent condition. No Gospel can influence men or make headway in the world, except it have beneath it a framework of positive ideas. The power to clearly define these and to cogently maintain them seems to be on the wane in Liberal circles. In place of it we see an invasion of sentiment, much of which is shallow and some of which is false.

Hence we accord a warm welcome to Dr. Mellone's book—or rather, shall we say, to Dr. Mellone as the writer of the book. For while these pages are valuable for what may be learnt from them, they are further to be welcomed as indicating in our midst a powerful mind fully alive to the need aforesaid and likely to play an important part in its satisfaction. The lectures—for such they are—have a purpose, which is to clarify thought on the greatest of questions. Our impression is that they succeed, and we have no hesitation in classing this among those books of religion, all too few in number, which constitute a real help to faith in God.

Dr. Mellone shows insight when he treats the religious problem not as an abstract thing apart, but with reference to the personalities of men who have grappled with it before him—Newman, Martineau, Comte, Spencer, Browning. All philosophy is relative to the philosopher. The conclusions of speculative thought, far from being of all human products the most detached from the personality of their authors—as sometimes represented—are the most nearly related thereto. The several types of religious thought here considered are, we venture to think, the expression of the temperament, the type of passion, the peculiar spirit of life which animated their respective authors. Such is the nature of philosophy that a skilled student, taking this fact for his clue, might read off the temper of successive ages from the philosophic conclusions popular in each. No philosophic reasoning which overlooks the importance of this human element can, in our judgment, succeed in the presentation of truth. Were a machine to be invented which should solve the deep problems of the universe with the precision of the American Patent Calculator we doubt whether the results, despite their certainty, would supply a single idea with power to move mankind. They would be insignificant, and men would turn from them and look rather for light and leading to the broken fragments of truth which are stammered out by fallible human lips. How far truth depends for its cogency on this human element few of us sufficiently realise. By giving it a proper weight Dr. Mellone has made his book not only interesting but important. He distinguishes well between religious thought, which is a serious thing, and thought about religion, which may be nothing more than intellectual amusement. He has a true perception that the real significance of religious thought lies not in the conclusions at which it arrives, but in the impulse of the spirit from which it originates.

That distinction, and we think it all-important, is the clue to Dr. Mellone's criticism of Newman as a religious thinker. Here he displays an admirable psychological insight. In Newman's reverence for antiquity lies, we are told, a key to his theological development. This reverence for antiquity is a well-known characteristic, proceeding in part from the amiable delusion that because the men of the past are old-fashioned in our eyes they were equally old-fashioned in their own. We view their opinions in the midst of a stately quietude from which the dust of life's arena has long blown away, forgetting that they in their day were immersed in the same turmoil of novelty which makes our own opinions so unstable and troubled. To a genuine historical sense Chrysostom or St. Augustine in his own time and place is a new and perhaps startling phenomenon in the world of religious thought, having as yet no authority, but waiting for a position to be assigned him by the doubtful verdict of men.

But minds like Newman's think of the great opinions of the past as enjoying in their own time the dignity they enjoy in ours, and the desire of their hearts is to secure for the troubled thought of living men the serenity which they falsely attribute to the thoughts of the ancient dead. Seated among the ruins of the past they are conscious only of the quiet now reigning; they see the colours which time has softened into harmony, hear the gentle murmuring of the doves, note the ivy tenderly clinging to the walls, and flowers that flourish amid shattered stones, and a longing comes over them that they might live for ever in the midst of so rare a peace. But history shatters the dream. The walls that are now hoary were once as new as the town-hall opened yesterday; no ivy grew and no doves murmured, but men fought and servants chattered, and yon gap where the rose blooms so sweetly was the chosen mark of an enemy's fire. So men deceive themselves when they talk of the peace of the "early ages," or imagine that in the time of Augustine or Anselm doubt was less insistent or the mind less open to its attack.

Dr. Mellone's summary of Newman's positions is adequate, and we find his criticisms clear and convincing. Newman could not enter into the idea of a religion which was not founded on dogma. With this inability Dr. Mellone concurs, substituting, however, for "dogma," the more accurate term "doctrine"; and at this point he takes occasion to comment unfavourably on the habit, which has recently become fashionable in "liberal" quarters, of disparaging "doctrine." But when Newman makes doctrine essential Dr. Mellone detects an inversion of truth, holding that while doctrine is necessary to religion the true essence of the latter is the "experience" of the soul. The weakness of Newman's argument for development of doctrine under infallible guidance, while the very notion of infallibility is itself a product of the development it is used to justify, is well and clearly indicated. "Development" frequently involves the abrogation of a first idea by the second idea to which it leads. On the other hand Dr. Mellone does not dismiss the historical forms of Christianity as mere corruptions, but holds them to be expressions, more or less imperfect, of a real experience. In this connection we have an interesting criticism of the position of Dr. Martineau who, if our author's understanding of him is correct, regarded the entire system of historical dogma as a baseless fabric of human invention. Dr. Mellone inclines to the view that the various elements of this system were a true expression, for the time and place in which they were offered, of experiences which are permanent in all ages but subject to ever changing variety in the form of their presentation.

In giving an account of Dr. Martineau's ethical theory the charge is made of non sequitur. The gist of the criticism is this. Dr. Martineau begins by placing the final authority in the conscience, and from this he argues inferentially to another Authority which is not in the conscience at all, but in a second Person—namely, God. Now, the final "seat" having been found in man, the way is barred for a subsequent transference of it to God. In other words, on Dr. Martineau's view of God and Man as entirely separate Personalities, the authority of conscience would still remain even if there were no God. The hypothesis of God to account for Conscience is therefore superfluous. This criticism, which we do not propose to discuss, appears to us striking and suggestive.

More important even is what Dr. Mellone has to say on Martineau's view of the isolation and independence of the individual will. Martineau's position assigns to the human will an excessive, and a too exclusive, part in working out the salvation of the individual. Such are the resources of Free Will that at any moment the individual is able to turn from the evil and do the good. This our author holds to be philosophically untenable, and inconsistent with the known facts of life. Salvation for man is attained not, as Martineau is said to teach, by the action of the individual will upon its environment, but by its interaction with the environment. This position, which leaves the Free Will controversy untouched, appears to us the stronger. Of the many forces playing upon a man and forming his moral destiny, only a part, and perhaps a small part, resides in the will of the isolated self. In the totality of forces, in society, in nature, in the past history of the race, together with whatever may be contributed by his personal initiative, lies the cause of which the salvation or ruin of a soul is the effect. The presentation of this view gives Dr. Mellone occasion for some weighty remarks on a notable weakness in current Unitarian teaching.

We must leave aside Dr. Mellone's treatment of his remaining authors and content ourselves with a short reference to the chapter entitled "What is Religious Experience," a chapter we regard as the most important in the book—not, however, to the disparagement of the rest. The explanation given of religious experience is impressive and, we think, sufficient. Religious experience is, in brief, our conscious apprehension of a Larger Life with which our own is vitally one. The unity of that Life with ours, and of ours with it, is the sole condition which makes the experience possible. In this view we detect the general nature of the writer's philosophy. We forbear to specify his idealism, but he is evidently of the opinion that the perceiving Self is a constituent element of the thing perceived. No object can be present to the Self unless the Self is, in some sense, present in the object. This view Dr. Mellone applies to religious experience. Whatever vision the soul may have of the Divine involves the unity of the Divine with man. Here we touch the most important difference between the writer and Martineau. There is an aspect of Martineau's teaching which seems to represent Conscience as the authority of Another Person impressed upon the soul of man. But Dr. Mellone regards it as the authority of our own deeper life, in which we are one with the life of God. Only as such could we have experience of its divine meaning. There is, indeed, in Martineau's philosophy what the writer describes as "a third line of thought" which involves, and even states, this position; this Dr. Mellone points out, though how it can be reconciled with the "second line of thought" is not indicated.

We are glad that our writer, in his explanation of Religious Experience, dismisses the notion of ecstatic visions or other preternatural states of mind. The experience of the religious man is not essentially different from that of all men, but a deepened form of the same. Whatever experience the religious man may have comes to him through the perception, the duties, the affections, the reasonings of normal human life; it is not something outside of these, but a meaning which they contain. This view Dr. Mellone calls "symbolism," distinguishing it from mysticism, which makes religious experience an abnormal state of the soul. We think Dr. Mellone's definition of mysticism somewhat arbitrary, but he has done well in giving an interpretation of the highest spiritual facts, which cannot be charged with "other-worldishness" or false sentiment. On the basis here laid down the way is open for a healthy union of Religion and Life.

Our author is a strong thinker and master of a good philosophical style. The literary value of his book is high, for it is clear, articulate, and agreeable to read. We trust, however, Dr. Mellone, in his future writings, of which we hope there will be many, will not consider it beneath the dignity of a philosopher to carry to a yet finer perfection the much needed art of making philosophic truth plain to unphilosophic minds. If any one can find a truly effective mode of doing this he will be able to meet one of the great wants of the age. In philosophy we must be not only precise but clear; and clearness involves a certain condescension to the difficulties of untrained minds. Dr. Mellone is clear; but he will forgive us for saying greater clearness must be attained if philosophers are to give the world the full extent of the help which is in their power to give. L. P. JACKS.

OBITUARY.

MISS ROWLAND, OF NEATH.

IT is with great sorrow we record the sudden death of Miss Rowland, of Ffrwd Vale, Neath, in her thirty-eighth year. A fortnight ago she contracted a cold, which developed rapidly into pneumonia, and on Sunday evening, May 25, she passed peacefully away.

To give an adequate account of her life and work is not here possible. Although only thirty-eight years of age, she was one of the most prominent ladies in connection with educational and philanthropic work in the towns of Swansea and Neath. Miss Rowland was the only child of the late Alderman J. H. Rowland, some time High Sheriff of Glamorgan. On her father's side she descended from Philip Henry, who is supposed to have been a native of the Neath district. Alderman Rowland died three years ago. His daughter possessed great business capacities, and these she devoted with a rare energy to the alleviation of suffering and poverty. She was one of the founders of the Neath Nursing Institute, and in her will left to that body the sum of £2,000. Much could be said of her work in connection with thrift clubs. She organised and superintended these, and had a great influence on the life of the members for good. She brought her refinement and gentleness of spirit directly to bear on the poor. All felt that in her they had one who was deeply interested in their social welfare, for all felt that they were helped without being pauperised.

Her work for education was great. She was a member of the council of the Swansea Training College, of the Court of Governors of the University College of South Wales, and of the Neath Intermediate Education Board. She was a member of the Unitarian Church, Swansea, and was getting more and more interested in the work which we are attempting to do in the town. The significance of our work was impressed on her by attending last year the great International meetings. Had she lived a few years longer, my impression is that she would have been of great service to the Unitarian body.

On the day of her funeral the town of Neath presented a sight not soon to be forgotten. The presence of the Mayor and Corporation, as well as of representatives of all the public bodies in the town, testified that a rare personality had passed away. The footpaths from her beautiful home to the old Parish Church at Cadoxton-juxta-Neath, a distance of over two miles, were lined with thousands of people—rich and poor—from old age to babies in arms. The service at the graveside was taken by the writer—her minister. And so, on Wednesday, May 28, we laid in the tomb of her fathers the body of one of the sweetest and rarest spirits which these districts had ever known, as well as the last descendant in the Swansea Unitarian Church of one of the ejected two thousand—Philip Henry. The writer of this notice has been invited by the Nonconformist Bodies of Neath to preach on Thursday evening, June 5, a sermon on her life and work, and the Knoll-road Congregational Church, the largest building in the town, has been placed at his disposal. A memorial service will also be held next Sunday morning at her own church, Swansea. We mourn her loss, but we rejoice that God ever gave our Church a spirit so rare, who lived so much in so short a time.

Nests: "Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts."—Ruskin.

WE are now in the midst of the nesting season. From other parts of the country and from over-sea, from the shores of the Mediterranean, from Egypt and India, and from the great rivers of Africa the birds have come in their piping and chattering hosts to this their favourite old England, to build their nests and rear their young in the land where they were born. We can almost fancy them saying to themselves, as they fly over the daisy-pied meadows, and flit from tree to tree,—

I thank the goodness and the grace
That on my birth have smiled,
And made me in these Christian days
A happy English child.

Do you think a bird could sing that? Almost. And now they are so busy. First seeking out every imaginable place of safety for the future home, thick thorny bushes, high trees, crannies in roofs and haystacks, holes in the earth, among the bulrushes in the river, and on the dangerous cliffs. The big green woodpecker picks a hole in the side of a tree where the wood is rotten, and down in its burrow makes its nest of chips. The thrush takes great care to shut out all draughts by plastering the walls of its nest inside with a smooth lining of mud. I once knew a thrush to build in a very windy place, so she bound her nest to the tree with long strands of dead nettle that it might not be blown away. The homely sparrow is no architect, but he makes his comfortable, untidy home of hay and feathers.

The merry little chaffinch weaves a charming snuggery of bits of wool and moss and lichen. The marten and the swallow are true builders, for they use bricks of clay as we do, only they mould them in their mouths, and so lay brick by brick under the eaves and on the rafters. The kingfisher—funny fellow—makes a cave in the river bank and in it spreads his bed of bones—the bones of the fishes he has eaten. And think of the delicate art of the tiny golden-crested wren which binds its mossy walls firmly together with—what do you think? Grass? wool? hair? No, with cobwebs. While the long-tailed tit, industrious mite, is not content until she has built a nest containing at least 2,000 tiny feathers. I suppose there is so little warmth in her small body that she could not hatch her eggs and rear her young except in a very warm feathery nursery. And so for every different kind of bird a different kind of nest—every shape and plan and material you can think of. How beautiful it all is! Never destroy a nest or take it from its place unless you are sure that the young birds have flown and it will be needed no more.

Now a very wise man, John Ruskin, has told us that we, like the birds, ought to build nests. He does not mean houses, but another kind of nest, "Make yourselves nests," he says, "of pleasant thoughts." This kind of nest is also a home to live in.

Has it ever struck you how much you live in your thoughts? You run about here and there, you look at everything there is to see, you laugh and play—but presently, like a bird returning from its flight, you, too, settle down, and then you find that you are thinking of something. You have settled down amongst your thoughts. They are your nest, which you, like a bird, have built according to your wisdom, with what kind of leaf or feather you have found. Our thought-nests, like the birds' nests, must needs be well and beautifully built.

A simple country youth who followed the drum, and is now shouldering his gun in South Africa, has been writing to his old teacher, a friend of mine, who writes to him. In his letter a little while ago the lad said this:—"Dear Sir, I always like your letters—for you always put good thinks into my head." The fact is the boy has found that out on the wide, weary veldt, and after the day's dull dirty march, it's very nice to get back and rest in a good think—a sweet thought: a thought of the love of home, of the ships he used to watch from the shore, of a verse he learnt at school, of the manly resolves which he will work out when he gets back again. But we do not need to enlist and go to the war to find out the value of a nest which is not made of moss and feathers but of wise and lovely thoughts woven together. It is easier to do without a roof over our heads than without a nest for our minds. So let us build our nest wisely and well. Pick up the little threads of love and knowledge—all you can—weave in the feathers of fairy fancy, and build the nest for your mind to rest in on the strong bough of truth.

THE CHILDREN'S COUNTRY HOLIDAY.

SIR,—The Committee of the Country Holiday Fund having suddenly determined to cease operating this year, the children of my Sunday-school (Domestic Mission, George's-row, E.C.) are without the opportunity of a most needful change. I regard this contingency as rather of the nature of a catastrophe. In the very centre of London, and crowded into the smallest possible space, numbers living in one and two small rooms, it is most necessary that for once in the year the children should be allowed and afforded the health-giving exhilaration of fresh air and country life, I appeal to kind friends to assist me in making this possible. Out of a roll of upwards of 300 scholars, I should like to provide for at least fifty of them, some of the cost of which being defrayed by the parents, all of whom, however, are very poor, and some entirely out of work. Last year, by the aid of the Country Holiday Fund, sixty-six children were sent away for a fortnight each. I am sorry to have to make this appeal, but the necessity is great. My address is 4, Durley-road, Stamford-Hill, London, N.

FREDERICK SUMMERS.

A similar appeal reaches us from Mr. William Wilson, of the Rhyl-street Domestic Mission, whose address is 5, Claremont-road, Cricklewood, N.W. If anything is to be done in this matter with substantial results, would it not be wise for the Committee of the Domestic Mission Society to organise a united effort for the present year?—ED. INQ.

PEACE.

LATE on Saturday evening, May 31, the terms of surrender accepted by the Burghers of the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, were signed at Pretoria by their representatives and by Lord KITCHENER and Lord MILNER, the representatives of the British Government, and on Sunday the news was received in this country with intense relief and thankfulness that Peace was at last assured.

With thankfulness indeed, which it is beyond the power of words to express, but with no exultant rejoicing, can we receive this news. That the hateful carnage of war may now cease in South Africa, that brave men who have sought to destroy one another may now clasp hands as friends, that those who have laid waste the land may now unite in building up again what they have destroyed (but many thousands there are whom Death will not restore), that prisoners may be released and fugitives be brought home again—the thought of all this comes upon us like a great tide, calm and deep, as the relief and gladness of the fresh and peaceful morning after a hideous nightmare. But through it all there comes to us a bitter cry, which refuses to be silenced. Why need this have been? For what has the awful cost of this war been paid?

For more than two and a-half years the overwhelming forces of the British Empire have been bent upon the task of reducing to subjection a people whose love of their country and of independence is as strong as our own. We do not discuss here and at this moment the vexed question of who was responsible for the outbreak of hostilities. There are those who say that apart from all question of franchise and sinister plotting on one side or the other, the conflict was sooner or later inevitable, and it was necessary for the peace of South Africa and the safety of the Empire, that the British power should once for all be asserted as dominant over the Boer states. They were justified, it has been freely said, in attempting to assert their predominance in the country and in fighting for their freedom, but we also were justified, and it was necessary that the stronger world-power should prevail. It was thus a conflict of force, and now at last it is proved which is the stronger.

We may be thankful to know that the British power, having prevailed, means well by those whom it has forced into the Empire, and promises ample liberty and equal rights, and expects many advantages for the united people, which otherwise had been impossible; and our most earnest prayer must be that the noblest traditions of our Empire may in fact prevail, and that the happy fraternisation of the men who have been in the field may be a good augury of a deeper and more lasting union. But there must ever remain the bitter and humiliating thought that in this age of the Christian era this consummation had to be reached by such tragic conflict; that wisdom, patience, and conciliation could not prevail; and that only after the fearful devastation and misery of these years of war can the task begin of building up a better order and securing a lasting peace.

Those of us who feel the humiliation to be ours will bear with the greater patience the burdens that are laid upon our people, and the grievous losses our country has sustained; but all of us, wherever we may lay the blame, must surely be appalled at the loss and suffering entailed, and must realise that we are now not to rejoice in any glorious triumph, but to set ourselves very soberly and earnestly, in the spirit of a true self-sacrifice, to a great and difficult task.

As to the temper which should be in our thanksgiving for this peace, some true words were spoken on Monday in St. Paul's Cathedral by the Bishop of STEPNEY. They must rejoice, he said, that the long strain of war was over, but it was a solemn act of thanksgiving to which he invited them.

There was much to solemnise in the peace which had come. It was solemn to think that the spirit of the great Queen who sustained them in their darkest moment of the war was now at rest. It was solemn to think of the great lessons which God had been teaching them during the past two and a half years—lessons of national self-restraint and reflection. It was solemn to think of the lives that had been laid down, and the long days of self-denying bravery which had been borne on the veldt. It was solemn to think what this peace must mean to their enemies laying down their arms—ignorant, doubtless, and misled, but brave and determined, let it be generously remembered. It was solemn to think of the great national responsibilities into which the peace now ushered them. He asked them to remember these solemnising things—not that they might spoil their joy, but that they might give it dignity and reverence and self-restraint. It was not the sense of solemnity that would spoil their joy; it was another spirit that would do so—the spirit of a levity so heedless that it used this very time of national rejoicing as an excuse for an outburst of vulgar noise, and for the abandonment of those restraints which their English customs and honourable English ways put upon the indulgence of their less seemly passions and desires. He pleaded to the great multitude he was addressing to do its utmost that night, and during the rest of the week, to preserve in the midst of the national rejoicing the traditions of national dignity and self-control. Surely a war which had left the mark of so much that had been memorable, of which all future generations of Englishmen would be proud, was not to be closed by the outbreak of any spirit which would make Englishmen ashamed of themselves. Surely, when they thought of the great danger to the empire that had been averted, they would try to prevent its becoming the occasion for giving place to a danger far greater to our empire—the danger of this spirit of heedlessness and thoughtlessness and indifference to God. Let, therefore, the solemnity of the occasion give to their joy these added qualities of reverence and dignity and self-restraint, respect for God, for their cause, for themselves, and for their country.

On Sunday morning the KING and QUEEN are to attend the morning service at St. Paul's, and Thanksgiving Services will be held throughout the country. The Archbishops of CANTERBURY and YORK have issued, under the direction of the KING, the following special prayer of Thanksgiving to be used at these services:—

Almighty God, by Whose providence the affairs of nations are guided to the fulfilment of Thy Holy Will, we approach Thy Throne of Grace to give Thee heartfelt thanks for the close of the war in which we have been so long engaged. We thank Thee for the many occasions on which Thou hast granted success to our arms, but above all we thank Thee that Thou hast now restored to our nation and to our adversaries the blessings of peace. We pray Thee to forgive us whatever we have done amiss in this time of strife. Finally, we pray Thee that both we and those who have lately been our enemies may henceforward be filled with the spirit of mutual generosity and goodwill, that as each has striven to prevail over the other in battle, each may now strive to vie with the other in justice and loving-kindness. Crown, O Lord, we beseech Thee, the blessing of peace with the blessing of unity and concord; for the sake of Thy Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

Except for the one sentence, giving thanks "for the many occasions on which Thou hast granted success to our arms," which grates upon us as a pagan survival, in harsh contrast with all that follows, this is a prayer to which we must hope that there will be a true and deep response in the hearts of our whole people. And let the second lesson specially appointed, Coloss. iii. 1-16, be also taken to heart.

WHAT THIS PEACE OUGHT TO MEAN TO US.

I.

PEACE at last! We can never receive such a gift without deep thankfulness, but our joy is chastened with sad remembrance of the grievous waste of precious lives ever since we were assured in the autumn of 1900 that the war was over. For South Africa we must all desire that the work of reconstruction may be wisely and generously carried out. In the Government terms we may hope that the vanquished foe may recognise something more than the lust of conquest, something not unlike a spirit of conciliation and goodwill. There must still be many scenes of sorrow and suffering: may those who have lost so much meet with patience and consideration at the hands of the people which has paid so heavy a price for victory. We have extinguished nationality; have we any better gifts to bestow?

But we naturally turn to consider the effects of the Peace upon ourselves. They will, of course, be manifold and complex. For more than a year past the nation has accepted the war as a kind of chronic sore. Its dramatic interest was gone; the fever of strife declined, though it could not wholly disappear. Peace may bring us more time for reflection. In what spirit do we wish to conduct our politics? What influences do we most desire to guide us? What are the aims which we propose to ourselves in our relations with the Great Powers of the world? and by what means do we desire to achieve them? We shall strive to free ourselves from the sway of irresponsible journalism, and shall endeavour to prevent judgment from being swept away by prejudice and interest and passion. And we shall demand of our statesmen seriousness of foresight; we shall call upon them to control instead of stimulating the forces of ignorant clamour; we shall expect them to concentrate their energies on thinking out a policy which shall prevent future wars. It has been said that the Peace restores England to her position as chairman of the European Council. Will her leaders use this post of vantage to come to an understanding with the Power whose movements in Asia from time to time awaken vague spasms of anger and alarm?

Once more, the Peace may give us the opportunity for recovering our sense of proportion in national affairs, and laying the right emphasis on our duties and obligations rather than on commercial gain and territorial aggrandisement. In order to annex a state as big as France we have spent nearly three years in subjugating a people of the size, say, of Leicester. And meanwhile the welfare of forty millions at home has been neglected. The complicated problems of poverty, disease, and drink, though they are of enormously greater importance, are not so exciting as colossal dreams of painting large tracts on the map of the world red. The fact is that it is much easier to conduct a foreign war than to heal Irish misery, or organise labour more equably, or govern India for its own benefit. On all hands we are confronted with tremendous problems. War enables us to thrust them for a time on one side. The Peace recalls them to us, and adds to them the gigantic difficulties of racial differences—English and Dutch, white and black—in South Africa. Each difficulty is, however, a great opportunity; it calls for insight, magnanimity, patience, sacrifice. God grant us wisdom to rise to the height of our calling. J. ESTLIN CARPENTR.

II.

YOU ask me to send you a few words as to "What this Peace ought to mean to us." Above all things it seems to me to mean "opportunity," such as was almost impossible in the turmoil and excitement of the war.

Some will regard it as primarily an opportunity for rejoicing and demonstration, others as one for relief from financial strain and personal anxieties; others again will see in it mainly an opportunity for renewed commercial enterprise. All these it may be, but is it not much more, and shall we not fail miserably to make a fit use of the occasion if we do not see much more in it?

It is an opportunity for reconsidering our attitude towards our political opponents at home: and asking ourselves whether opinions very widely differing from our own may not coexist with a patriotism as earnest as our own. There may be men on both sides whose motives we have some warrant for suspecting, but there must be numbers whose judgments have differed widely, but whose motives have been equally pure.

It is an opportunity for quietly reviewing the course of the war and all that led up to it in the light of our highest ideal of statesmanship and national duty.

It is an opportunity of reconsidering our attitude towards other peoples: whether it should be primarily that of the strong man armed, or that of the just man courteous; whether a better guarantee for national safety is not to be found in such a line of conduct as will inspire confidence and goodwill than in excessive armaments, which tend to exhaust that which they are designed to protect.

It is an opportunity of turning our attention once more to the pressing domestic problems which loudly demand solution if we are to be fit to remain the leading member of a great and enlightened Empire.

Finally, is it not an opportunity of bringing the whole matter under review from the standpoint of religion; of asking ourselves whether the struggle in which we have been engaged has been just and been conducted in such a spirit that we emerge from it a purified and strengthened people, with our material losses balanced by our spiritual gains; of pondering once more the problems of Christianity and War, and, if possible, arriving at some conclusion which may afford us guidance for the future.

JOHN DENDY.

III.

THIS is no patched-up peace, but a real pacification, likely to endure because established on broad and generous lines. It is a peace with honour to both Briton and Boer, because each has borne himself well in the long struggle, now ended in favour of the more progressive race. Such are the ways of Providence, mysterious to our short-sighted vision; out of apparent evil comes good. The war may probably prove to be the foundation from which a fresh step forward is made in the world's history.

It will be long before we realise all that the Peace means to us. A serious danger has been removed from our path; an open sore, which was cutting into the vitals of the Empire, has healed over; we are free to work out our destiny. The country resumes her place amongst the nations of the world with undiminished prestige, sobered nevertheless, as she ought to be, by the ordeal through which she has passed. The last great race difficulty existing in our Colonial Empire appears solved, and we can now with confidence look forward to an era of peace. The torrent of abuse poured out upon us by the European Press will now dry up, and by degrees the bitter feelings engendered will die away. Our home affairs will assume their proper place; the unnatural excitement of the last three years will no longer prevent the best and most earnest thought of the nation being given to the solution of the many social problems so urgently calling for attention.

B. DOWSON.

IV.

SOME of us cannot help being freshly reminded by this Peace of the sad chapter which it closes—a chapter full of incidents that suggest anything but peaceful thoughts. If we refrain from unpacking our hearts, if we hush to silence a scorn that seems most just and a wrath that seems most righteous, it is because we would subdue ourselves fully to the spirit of the hour and lose ourselves in dreams of better things. Wearied as we have been by sickening evils at the seat of war and by shameful things at home, disgusted by vulgar appeals to the lowest passions of the people from men who knew better and who took their profit of help or power out of the blind prejudices which they fostered, we have been long dumb without the solace of these happy dreams. But the war has really ended at last, and I confess my first impulse is to let loose the pent-up flood of feeling, and leave such record as I may of "how it strikes a contemporary."

But possibly there would be a taint of self-indulgence in utterances of that kind; and most probably they would but mingle one more drop of bitterness in that full cup which our beloved England must yet drink, down to the dregs. There is bitterness enough and to spare.

Rather, let us reassure ourselves, and teach one another, if we may, by a recognition of the necessarily ephemeral character of all war—as, indeed, of all evil. The war, even this war, is over; it has been too hateful to last longer, besotted as men have been by greed and savage boastfulness. The normal conditions of civilisation must be peaceful. It costs too much, every way, to keep on fighting. Even the Power with the longest purse and the strongest military force cannot utterly and always defy reason, as the terms of the Peace amply prove. It has taken a long time, no doubt, to demonstrate the futility of unreasonable demands. There are still, it appears, people who have not yet accepted the demonstration. Happily, they have now a chance of experiencing in their own person the prescription which they are swift to offer to others, of yielding to a might stronger than themselves.

We are grateful for the brave and chivalrous spirit that has been shown in this war. We are especially thankful that sympathy was never more practical. If neither side can be credited with having strenuously tried to avoid war, both must be honoured for striving to avert its worst aspects. That is much, and yet it takes a good deal of the shining of such rays of humaneness to make the hell of war—the phrase is a soldier's—anything but intolerable at last.

Even the "Maffickers" and their patrons in high places can get too much of it then. This Peace may give us, therefore, a chance of pleading for "sweet reasonableness," not simply because it is "sweet," but because in the long run it is the only way of practically conducting human affairs. W. G. TARRANT.

V.

WITH a thankfulness too deep for words we have received the good news of Peace. No doubt many grave difficulties remain which it may take years to overcome. But most of us believe that the terms of peace are wise and generous, and that if faithfully carried out they will lead to reconciliation. Above all other things, we want large-minded sympathetic administrators in South Africa. Almost everything depends on a few men who will have the practical management of affairs. If they are mere officials, standing on their dignity, arrogant in their authority and playing the part of conquerors, nothing can save us from another war. If they are men like Lord Kitchener, at once strong and generous, not afraid of their own partisans, with an understanding and genuine respect for the best side of the Boer character, then there is a chance of a lasting settlement which will bring prosperity to all the Empire.

To carry out the terms of peace in South Africa is the hardest and most honourable duty to which any man could be called. We at home can only urge the supreme importance of sending men of the right temper to take the management of affairs. Apart from this question of leaders, every Englishman in South Africa can do something to make or mar the chances of settlement. We must treat the Boers from the first not as conquered subjects but as fellow-citizens. We used to hear much of the petty tyranny and interference of the Boer police at Johannesburg. We must earnestly hope that there will be no petty tyranny and interference of the British police at Pretoria.

It would be idle then to ignore, amidst our Peace rejoicings, that the future has many dangers and difficulties and makes great demands upon our wisdom and magnanimity.

The temper of our people at home on the whole has been excellent. Most of us received the news of peace with a sigh of intense relief, not with rude songs of triumph. The admiration for the Boers is genuine and deep. We are sincerely anxious to be friends, and are ready to forget. We must remember, however, that it is much easier for us to feel friendly than for them. The side which wins is naturally inclined to be generous and forgiving. The great test of high-mindedness and sympathy must be shown in our future treatment of the Boers. They are not likely to forgive or forget easily. They are a brave people, who have lost what they valued supremely. Their loss will rankle for a long time: it will make them irritable; it will make them often unjust to us, and ungenerous in their judgments. We have gained our point, and while remaining firm we must be patient with them, and must not resent their natural bitterness.

Meanwhile, here in England we feel free for the moment from the oppression of the dark cloud of war and from the anxiety and strain of a hateful conflict, which, whatever our opinions, has weighed upon us all.

Free for what? Not merely free to make money and spend it on ourselves, not merely free to take our ease and go sleepily along our old ways. It is not for this that our young men have flung away their lives in thousands. It is a freedom to face the poverty of the poor and the misery of their condition, and to attempt more hopefully and zealously to instruct and uplift them. It is a freedom to follow high ideals of social and national life, and fearlessly to press them on our people and the world. All reforms have been impeded, all hopes dimmed, while the war was going on its disastrous way. Now that peace has come there is a call to everyone for new hope and energy. There is so much, so infinitely much to do at home to make the crooked straight and the rough places plain. May peace not only end our enmities, but make us more earnest, more simple, more devoted to the service of mankind. H. GOW.

VI.

THE church-bells of the first June Sabbath have rung in Peace. The long period of war has been one of great and terrible division amongst us English folk. We have been divided "the father against the son, and the son against the father; the mother against the daughter, and the daughter against the mother; the mother-in-law against her daughter-in-law, and the daughter-in-law against her mother-in law." Brother has suspected brother, and friend has turned away from friend. For a tremendous problem of national ethics clave us in twain, and judgment differed from judgment, and conscience from conscience. In no community was this painful division more marked than in our own little fellowship of churches. Yet all the while we each knew that there were good men and women on the side opposed to our own; and amid all the exasperation and the language stern or harsh, in our heart of hearts we longed to understand each other and to be reconciled.

And now the joy-bells ring in not only peace between Englishman and Boer, but surely also the spirit of reconciliation between friend and friend at home. Without abandoning one conviction or principle which we have tenaciously held, we are to recognise the proclamation of peace as a call to all English citizens to strive to unite in giving expression to the higher conscience and idealism of the English race. For now we all see one duty—the duty of goodwill and helpfulness and generosity and forgiveness.

There is evidence that those in whose hands the ultimate duty of negotiation lay in South Africa have striven to avoid the needless humiliation of our recent foes, and have recognised the high qualities displayed by them in the awful struggle now ended. Lord Kitchener has spoken generous words, and the response of the hearts of the Boer leaders has been quick and true. And while the more thoughtless crowds have acclaimed peace after precisely the same fashion in which they acclaimed war, by blowing paper trumpets and waving children's flags, there are vibrations in the air of an English consciousness that lies deeper than all these things. It has found expression from many tongues and pens—from the few words of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's speech in the House of Commons, from the Prayer that the Primate of All England has set on the lips of the Anglican Church:—"Finally, we pray that both we and those who have lately been our enemies may henceforward be filled with the spirit of mutual generosity and goodwill, that, as each has striven to prevail over the other in battle, each may now strive to vie with the other in justice and loving-kindness." Let all of us also pray that in our churches on Sunday.

Let us try to hold England to that. This proclamation of peace is a call to us all calmly and prayerfully to ponder wherein lies the true hope of the greatness and the lasting renown of our country—in territorial expansion, mercenary advantage, and military display, or in the steadfast service of freedom, education, sobriety, goodwill, and pure religion. And to whichever service seems to our calm reflection to be the nobler let us dedicate ourselves anew in love of our own people and of the great family of mankind.

RICHARD A. ARMSTRONG.

SELF-TRAINING FOR CHARITABLE WORK.

THE Charity Organisation Conference recently held in Edinburgh, with its numerous papers, speeches and debates, presents too wide a field for adequate report in a column of THE INQUIRER; but a short notice of a paper, read by Miss K. Bannatyne, of Glasgow, on "The Place and Training of Volunteers in Charitable Work," which was a contribution of special value, may possibly interest some of your readers.

The title scarcely indicates the inspiring character of the paper. It did not neglect to lay stress on the necessity of training in matters of practical detail and business routine, or to point out the advantage which would accrue from a knowledge of the functions of the Poor Law and other institutions, or of the help to be gained by a careful study of the lessons and experience of the past; but the writer rose to a higher level of thought in describing the spirit and aims which should animate all workers among the poor, and in suggesting the high ideals which should make them glow with enthusiasm for their work and help them to gain the personal training requisite for those who would be helpers of their less fortunate fellow-creatures.

And the first suggestion made was that happiness for rich and poor alike, though dependent partly on outward circumstances, is far more dependent on personal character, and that we can best help even the very poorest by encouraging their independence, developing their intelligence and strengthening their power of will. Wise practical counsels were given as to the evils arising from a free administration of outdoor relief with its discouragement of thrift and family responsibility; its supplementation of low wages, and the hardships brought in consequence upon the poorer ratepayers struggling to maintain their own independence. It was further pointed out that while we may, by our gifts, safely hope to ameliorate the general condition of the community by helps to education, by the opening of art galleries, by the preserving of open spaces and so forth, the dole system, on the contrary—or, as Mrs. Bodichon has called it, "sprinkling charity"—is intrinsically bad because small, uncertain grants of money can do nothing to help permanently any individual cases of distress. "In old days men gave alms to the poor; in these days we are required to withhold the alms and give the larger gift of ourselves, brains, heart and soul, as our reasonable service."

And this thought leads to the assertion of the principle that the most important characteristic of true charitable work is the personal, wisely sympathetic element. We must deal with each poor person as an individual, and distrust all schemes which attempt to help men, women, and children in hundreds, and which talk glibly of "social regeneration" in the mass. We shall learn to understand how, if in old days men were often baptised in crowds, both then and now they can only be saved individually "with our toil and with our tears." And so we shall grow in reverence for the poorest and weakest human being, because of the possibilities hidden within.

Miss Bannantyne speaks further of the need for volunteers in charitable work to cultivate in themselves the power of imagination and of quick insight—of reading character—that they may be able to enter into, and understand, the causes of trouble and sin, and to sympathise, encourage and strengthen. And with this power of imagination is to be cultivated the faculty of patience which shall make them unwearied in well-doing and always hopeful, though there may seem to be little visible improvement in the men and women who are handicapped by their early influences, education and environment.

No less needful in charitable work, we are reminded, is cheerfulness. "Few people realise the power for good which happiness—just sheer, honest, open-hearted gladness and cheeriness—carries with it, and what a refreshing, invigorating force it can exert. Why does our idea of sympathy in charitable work imply a constant readiness to weep with those that weep, but generally stops short of the corresponding readiness to rejoice with those that do rejoice? Yet the talisman of happy laughter can boast of many a cure, as the poor rheumatic old woman had discovered when she said of the new district visitor that she was the best one she ever had, because she always made her enjoy a laugh!"

Last, not least, comes self-training in greater faith that the ideals which rise before us and which we struggle to carry out in the world about us shall one day be realised—a faith, too, which can make our self-control strong enough to resist the temptation of sacrificing moral and spiritual strength in others to their physical comfort and ease, and to refuse to believe that, when, for ourselves, we know our industry and independence, our self-respect and family responsibilities to be of greater value than any material possession, the reverse can be true for the poor.

At the end of her address Miss Bannatyne considers the question as to where and how this sort of training can be obtained by charitable volunteers. Books are mentioned, lectures, and classes, the experience, so gladly given, of trained workers, and the help to be obtained in Settlements and at the offices of the Charity Organisation Society. "But above all," she concludes—and this thought is in harmony with the rest of her paper—"above all, we can train ourselves, for if we keep ever before us, in all our relationships with the poor, a vision of that personal righteousness we crave for ourselves, of that family life we desire for those we love best, we cannot go far astray. And so the formation of noble character, which in mere empty outline was our aim at the beginning of our work and training, becomes in the end a living reality, realised in the individual characters of men and women whom we have helped and who have helped us—our friends and fellow-citizens."

"HOME" FOR THE ILL-HOUSED.*

BY THE REV. B. KIRKMAN GREY.

I HAVE referred in previous reports to the wretched inadequacy of housing accommodation, and to the use of our hall in supplying in a small degree something of what the home lacks. We offer the people, in a sense, a common drawing-room, a centre of social intercourse. I have had recently an illustration of the fact that the Hall is something more. It is a good many years since a book appeared with the mildly cynical title, "How to be Happy though Married." One part of the recipe for happiness was to have a boudoir—a pouting room—a relief from the close intimacy of those we love. In the one, two and three room tenements of this district people cannot have a quiet room to themselves. The housing question is often spoken of in its effect upon decency, an effect which I believe to be greatly exaggerated in the popular imagination, or in its effect on the health and comfort of the people, an effect which it is quite impossible to overstate. But the question of housing has quite as important a bearing on character, on morality, using that word in its general, not its technical sense. The rooms are too small and the walls too thin to favour good temper, which is the salt of social life. Ordinary human nature can hardly resist the temptation to speak loudly and harshly to two or three troublesome children who form half the child population of a small room. Then the loud voice penetrates the thin walls and disturbs the inmates of the next tenement, causing a raising of the voice there also. And the loud voice is an annoyance to tired and overstrung nerves, and an added provocation to ill temper. I do not know that tempers are worse in tenements than in "residential districts"; certainly there is more excuse if they are. The loud, harsh voice is more prevalent, but does not always betoken ill temper; it does, however, increase and is also a symbol of the wear and tear of life. In the tenement there is no escape from the presence of others; there is no spare room, no opportunity for retirement or quiet. Opportunities for ill temper are multiplied. Character is subject to the constant pinpricks of petty trials. The moral nature is kept fresh and sociable only through a too constant watchfulness.

The bearing of this on the usefulness of our Hall? One night, some half-hour before the time for a class, I found one of the members sitting by a bright fire in one of our rooms alone and looking glum. In a short conversation I learned the reason for this early appearance. "I was so irritable I couldn't sit at home without quarrelling." I was glad the fire was bright and the room quiet. I wished that our Hall might be more often useful in such ways as this; perhaps it is so more often than I know. One does not always understand why a human spirit wrapped about with human body sits silent on a chair in an empty room in the flicker of the fire-light. But oh! the pathos of this simple incident! To have to walk half a mile to be quiet lest we quarrel with those we love! This was great wisdom. It were often easier to sit at home and quarrel. It is often impossible to escape. And the rooms are so small and crowded that it is cruelly hard to prove master of oneself.

My knowledge of the conditions in which the poor live, knowledge that gains in depth and accuracy from the constant intercourse with them in their homes, where I visit week by week and year by year, adds a special difficulty to my work as a religious teacher. My own perceptions of what is most beautiful and good in human life, and my personal experience of the joy of communion with the divine, compels me to proclaim the supremacy of the inward life of worship. At the same time I am not blind to the fact that most of those to whom I speak can only attain to this higher life through almost superhuman effort. Life is so hard for the city poor that it must blunt the sense of joy, and in very many cases quenches all hope. It is not only the evil habits of parents, but also the conditions of industrial life that make "The Fatherhood of God" an unmeaning phrase for so many of my friends. In spite of such difficulties I preach still (because I can no other) the need for personal consecration, and the gladness as well as the duty of holiness. I trust that my testimony is not weakened by my poignant sympathy with those whose struggle is so much harder than my own through their unhealthy social environment. We all have to conquer personal unfitness: I do not conceal my belief that the slum dwellers have an added obstacle, and that bad houses, dirty streets, and work too prolonged and ill-paid are, no less than private vices, an abomination to the Lord.

POSTAL MISSION RELIGIOUS CONFERENCES.

SIR,—May I be allowed through your columns to inform Postal Mission secretaries and correspondents that the Rev. George Critchley is now holding a remarkably interesting series of conferences on "The True Story of the Life of Jesus" at College Chapel, Stepney Green, London, E.

In his introductory address last Sunday he dwelt on the importance of recognising various elements in the Gospels—namely, myth, legend and true historic incidents; he also touched on the different character of the Fourth Gospel and its probable late date. He then proceeded to examine the story of the birth of Jesus.

Mr. Critchley's perfectly frank and fearless yet reverent mode of treating the subject, and the originality of his remarks, rivetted the attention of the audience, and the animated discussion that followed was a further proof of the interest awakened.

These conferences are open to the public; they are held at College Chapel at 5 p.m. on the first Sunday of each month. Probably many in London besides Postal Mission inquirers would like to have the opportunity of attending.

IMPRESSIONS OF WHIT-WEEK.

VI.

This was the fourth time I had the privilege of attending the annual meetings, and I returned more impressed than ever by the importance of the gatherings and their far-reaching significance on the life of our churches. I presume that my experience does not differ widely from that of other ministers—namely, that these annual gatherings are to us a strength and inspiration to work harder than ever for the denomination which has given us what we could not elsewhere find. One returns home refreshed after the winter's work, and encouraged in having witnessed the enthusiasm of the veterans of the Unitarian body—men who laboured in darker days than ours.

It is exceedingly difficult to make a choice of the addresses. All were good, and many were important. Too much emphasis cannot be laid on the work Mr. Ion Pritchard and his committee are doing for our Sunday-schools. The excellent meeting of the Sunday School Association ought to prove helpful not only for our schools but for our churches. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed struck a note which showed the necessity of uniting the work of our schools with the work of our churches. Something, surely, ought to be done to prevent the terrible leakage which takes place after the age of fourteen. What a small percentage of the children we train in our schools are to be found as men and women in our churches. I feel convinced that nothing less than a constant infusion of "Principles and Ideals," mainly on the lines laid down by Mr. Wicksteed, is sufficient to prevent this loss. But, as Mr. Armstrong pointed out in his able and timely address, "Principles and Doctrines" were organically connected. Mr. Armstrong's address impressed me as indirectly pointing out two dangers which we as Unitarians should seek to obviate. We should not attempt (indeed, there is a sense in which we cannot succeed) to instil Principles apart from Doctrines. Doctrine is the body in which Principle incarnates itself. Bare principles without showing their tangible validity prove of very little value. In attempting to train our young to be religious we must attempt to train them to be Unitarians at the same time. The probability is that if we forget the close connection of Principle and Doctrine we train the young to be soon nothing. My experience is that the failure of Unitarians to realise this close connection is the cause of the absence of a large percentage of the young of our schools from our churches. The other danger, which I believe to be less than the previous one, is that doctrine of itself can neither bind a church into a Brotherhood, nor satisfy the whole needs of human nature. I should like to see Mr. Armstrong giving us some futher explanation as to the place of each—Doctrine and Principle—in the life of a church, and especially in the work of the ministry. Perhaps it is on the realisation of the true connection between the two, and the place of the two in the ministry and the work of the church, that our future depends. To me the address has opened a mine worth digging into.

Mrs. Osler's remarkable paper has followed me ever since the meetings, especially the part which insisted on our taking the difficult path, and demanding of our people, and our people demanding of us, a life of intense work and devoted self-sacrifice. The fact is, our congregations serve and sacrifice but little. Perhaps they think that we as ministers serve and sacrifice quite as little. Well, we may be asleep in the pulpit without knowing it, and faster asleep out of it. If the pew think so, let them tell us this. Let them tell us where we fail, and why we fail. They will do this if they have the true well-being of the cause at heart. Surely all of us can be told of our failures without being offended. It is well worth considering the part of Mrs. Osler's paper, why we are so satisfied with meagre results, and so unwilling to face difficulties for what we believe to be necessary and true.

As a convert to Unitarianism I was much impressed by the five papers on "Types of Religious Experience." The very fact that Unitarian Christianity is the only form of religion which satisfies such five able men is an additional proof that in it is to be found a "pearl of great price," a pearl which we cannot afford to neglect or undervalue without real loss to the world. May those who have found it, as well as those who have had it found for them, appreciate its worth, and hold it forth in its richness and beauty to the thousands of intelligent people all over our country who everywhere look for it, and have as yet failed to find it.

Swansea. W. Tudor Jones.

VII.

Naturally one would not have been surprised to find reaction after the exceptional gatherings of a year ago, and the first impression was one of pleasure at the largeness, interest, and enthusiasm of the meetings. As I only attended those connected with the B. and F. my notes must be confined to them. Amongst the utterances which most impressed me were Mr. Gow's sermon, so fearless, so outspoken, so candid, and sounding a note which it is so important to emphasise at the present time. It made one glad to think, as one listened to the preacher, that Mansfield had a connection with him by no means slight, for his grandfather, the Rev. J. G. Teggin, was minister at the Old Meeting from 1849 to 1857.

At the annual business meeting Mr. Hargrove's speech in seconding the adoption of the report stands out in my recollection—his emphasis of the fundamental truth not only of Unitarianism but also of all religion, and of the Catholicity of Unitarianism; and his remarks, so full of good nature, upon those designs which some discovered in the Council of the Association, but which he failed to detect. If our differences could only always be dealt with in this tone, how much better it would be!

Mrs. Osler very rightly had the first place at the public gathering; her speech, well expressed and excellently delivered (I did wish those church bells would stop ringing), particularly appealed to me in its call to resist sacerdotalism, especially with reference to the Education Bill, and to recognise the connection between the religious and the secular life—between religion and politics and social questions. This also was the dominant note in Mr. Thomas J. Hardy's eloquent and inspiring address. One felt there was here a personality, new to our meetings, of considerable power and with earnest convictions, whose future course will be watched with great interest. May he be able to arouse our churches to a sense of the paramount importance of those social questions, the demands of which, becoming ever more insistent, must be felt by all reformers!

Mr. Tchertkoff's paper proved the broadness of the platform from which he spoke. Though doubtless his views did not commend themselves to his hearers, I, for one, could not help feeling there was here food for reflection. This feeling was confirmed when, on the following Sunday, we attended in an upper room at the Mechanics' Institute at Tunbridge Wells, the service of our Free Church there—a church which appears to be animated by a true spirit of Brotherhood, and which manages to get on very well without a minister, so well, indeed, that they are taking into consideration the desirability of finding a more permanent home.

The five addresses on Thursday morning were all interesting, especially that of Mr. Alex. Webster, with its dry northern humour, and its graphic delineation of the childhood of a boy brought up in the straightest sect of Calvinists, which was a revelation to some of us.

Jno. Harrop White.

VIII.

The meetings were far more successful than I anticipated they would be. I feared they would seem rather dull after the splendid Conference of last year, when there were so many sources from which we could draw. But the papers on the whole attained a high level and induced one to be regular at the meetings. Despite the number of these there was opportunity to be present at all if anyone desired; the machinery worked remarkably smoothly; the arrangements were so perfect that nobody seemed to be conscious of any organisation. The spirit of the President ruled over the gatherings. It is surprising how he went through the drudgery involved and wore the same genial expression at the end as at the beginning. The week started well with wholesome criticism and anathemas on the Education Bill from Lady O'Hagan. The paper by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed is worthy of circulation in pamphlet form among our Sunday-school teachers. All were glad to note in him the reappearance of the family brilliance and earnestness. A remark dropped by the Rev. John Ellis as to the need of a consecutive series of lessons similar to the International Notes published by the Sunday-school Union should not be passed over. I know that in some of our schools these orthodox notes are being used not always with the necessary elimination of what we consider error.

Of Dr. Drummond's lecture one probably cannot speak too highly. I went simply to listen, but soon found myself taking copious notes on all the old envelopes I had about me. I fancy that some present would not have realised how much labour lay at the back of it, but those who had the privilege of studying under Dr. Drummond would perceive that here in compact form were generalisations from the detailed and scholarly lectures they had heard at college. For that reason the lecture when printed will require and deserve the most careful reading. It is to be hoped that it will have a wide circulation outside, for besides being a piece of constructive theology it successfully proves the unreliability of the testimony of the modern Christian consciousness to events of centuries ago. And now that the old supports are being removed by Biblical critics, theological writers are endeavouring to make this testimony the basis of the old creeds.

Mr. Gow's sermon was thoughtful, frank and bracing. He gripped the congregation at the outset and carried it along with him to the end. Those who read it in THE INQUIRER will mark its outspokenness; those who heard it delivered will remember the inspiring atmosphere created by its preacher. And there are thoughts in it for the application of both reader and hearer.

The five papers by ministers who have come to us from other denominations will be of great assistance to those in doubt. Yet I was a little disappointed that some of the readers contrasted their old faith with their new, instead of describing the actual stages of the transition from the one to the other. Three of the papers were chiefly comparative, and from that point of view were excellent; but from the titles announced, I expected that they would all be experiential, and only two—those by Mr. Wooding and Mr. Webster—were truly so. All must have admired these men who had bought their religion at a great price, and have rejoiced that making such different beginnings they had come to one conclusion. Many of our ministers can make comparisons between orthodoxy and Unitarianism, but it is for a few among us to point the actual way from the one to the other.

ALFRED HALL.

DOCTRINE AND DENOMINATION.

WE have received a printed copy of a letter addressed by Mr. R. D. Darbishire "To the Editor of THE INQUIRER," which begins by expressing astonishment that the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at a recent meeting, should have spoken of the Association as "Doctrinal and Denominational," and surmises that there must have been some mistake.

The letter then proceeds:—

"We who do know what we mean, and do—each of us—all we can to feed and encourage the enlightenment of every neighbour, of every man, woman, and child personally where we can so aid, from our deepest heart, with all our mind and strength, with our very soul, join, one and all, to bid those devils of Denominationalism and Doctrinal endeavour to 'get hence!'

"The scarlet sins of Denominational and Doctrinal segregation and effort, and of association for such objects, we sternly meet at once with universal indignation and absolute repudiation. It is written that 'thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only serve;—not your Denominational flag, or your Doctrinal image!

"I am without the skill or the style of your ordinary correspondents, but am urged by many voices of warm sympathy to appeal, by our faith in the Christianity of Jesus, by our hope of Open Brotherhood, and by our meek Love of God, to every humble hearer, to every sincere disciple, to every Minister and every layman and every woman, to stand up and fling from them the whole scandalous imputation.

"It is not the muddling theologian nor the unsanctified scholastic, nor the hypocrite, with the blinding beam in his own eye, to whom we will surrender our own personal worship and devotion, our interest in every brother—our Religion, the very condition of our holiest life, our final blessing in death—to any narrow Pharisaism, any dogmatic subscription, or any thing of the kind.

"E'en though it be a Cross
That raiseth me,
Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee—
Nearer to Thee."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Highland-place. — Anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when the Rev. Tudor Jones, F.R.G.S., of Swansea, preached two powerful sermons to large and appreciative congregations. In the evening the choir, under the direction of Miss A. G. George, gave an excellent rendering of the anthem, "Hearken unto me, O ye people." On Monday evening the Rev. W. Tudor Jones delivered a lecture on "Six Ways of Looking at the World." Mr. T. Walter Williams, B.Sc., Barrister-at-Law, occupied the chair.

Belfast: York-street.—On Wednesday, May 28, the Lagan lifeboat tent of the Independent Order of Rechabites, which has its meeting-place in the York-street Lecture Hall, and which numbered in December, 1901, 310 members, invited the Rev. Alexander Ashworth—an honorary member of the tent—to give an address. The subject was "The Importance of Training the Young in Habits of Temperance." On the motion of Mr. McCann, a superintendent of one of the three juvenile tents connected with the adult body, warm thanks were accorded to Mr. Ashworth. Many of the members are also members of the York-street congregation.

Bradford.—On Sunday evening the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, at Chapel-lane Chapel, offered a special prayer of thanksgiving for the conclusion of peace, and in a short address before the sermon made reference to the event. For some time past, he said, they had been eagerly looking forward to the termination of the war in South Africa. It had been the first thing they had thought of every morning as they looked through the pages of the paper, and the good tidings now published brought great joy to all. During the war they at Chapel-lane Chapel had had a most anxious time, as no fewer than twenty-five of their young men had been engaged in it. One had been killed, one had died, and two had been severely injured. It was, therefore, with deep gratitude that he now announced the suspension of hostilities, and he was sure that his feeling would be shared in every home throughout the length and breadth of the land. During the offertory the organist played Handel's "O, lovely peace."

Cardiff.—The West Grove Sunday-school held its anniversary and floral services on Sunday, June 1, when the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster, preached to appreciative congregations, morning and evening. Special hymns and anthem were rendered by the scholars. The church was profusely decorated, the flowers being afterwards taken to the infirmary. On the Wednesday following, the annual school treat was held at Barry Island.

Carlisle.—A bazaar, with the object of raising £200 to wipe off an accumulated adverse balance, and effect certain repairs in the Unitarian Chapel, Victoria Viaduct, was opened on Thursday, May 29, by Mrs. Baxter Ellis, of Newcastle-on-Tyne. Mr. James Arlosh presided, and was accompanied on the platform by Mr. Alderman Baxter Ellis, Mr. Marchington, Mr. Dixon, and the Rev. C. Travers, of Carlisle. The Hall was filled with people. The Chairman having introduced Mrs. Ellis, and spoken of the kindness shown by the Unitarians in the country to the congregation, Mrs. Ellis, in a graceful speech, declared the bazaar open. Mr. Alderman Ellis, responding to a vote of thanks on behalf of Mrs. Ellis, expressed his great pleasure, and that of Mrs. Ellis, in being able to be present, and at seeing so large a gathering of people. On Friday afternoon the bazaar was re-opened by Mrs. Arlosh, and a good company again assembled. A gross sum of £210 (including donations) was taken, and the congregation tender warmest thanks to all friends who have so generously helped to achieve this great success. A gratifying feature of the bazaar has been the unexpected sympathy and help of many non-Unitarians in the city.

Deal.—The services last Sunday were conducted by the Rev. C. A. Greaves, who preached to good congregations in the morning on "True and False Anthropomorphisms," and in the evening on "Count Tolstoy's Life and Work."

London: George's-row.—On Tuesday last the annual tea-party in connection with the Mothers' Meetings took place. After tea a number of the Sunday-school children, splendidly taught by Miss Withall, gave a cantata, entitled "Briar Rose," and which gave great satisfaction. It was repeated on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, Mr. Withall taking the chair on the last evening. At each performance the place was crowded.

London: Rhyl-street.—The week of religious services from May 26 to 30, conducted by Mr. Wilson, were very successful, having undoubtedly been helpful to the moral and spiritual life of those attending. The number present increased each successive evening, except the last, the average attendance being thirty-five. The organ music preceding each service was much appreciated, and the subjects of address were: "The Kingdom of God," "Repentance," "Faith and Works," "Rejoicing and being exceeding Glad," and "If any Man be in Christ he is a new Creature."

London: Stratford.—On Sunday, May 25th special Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held in the morning, afternoon, and evening, conducted by the Rev. F. Allen. The attendance at each of the services was very good, the church being fairly filled in the afternoon by the scholars and friends. On the following Wednesday a May festival in connection with the Temperance Guild and Band of Hope was held. About 50 children took part and performed a short operetta, by Wallace, very creditably. The performance was repeated on the Thursday and Friday evenings. The schoolroom was filled on each occasion.

Loughborough.—Successful Sunday-school anniversary services were held at the commencement of the present week. On Sunday the former minister, the Rev. H. E. Haycock, now of Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, preached morning and evening, and the scholars sang several of the hymns in this year's "Hymns and Choral Songs." At each service there was a large attendance. On Monday night the scholars gave an excellent rendering of Johnson's cantata, "The Rose Queen," when the minister, the Rev. P. Dean, acted as chairman, and the schoolroom was filled with a good audience. The collections at the services amounted to £15 12s. 3d., being an increase upon those of last year.

Norwich.—The Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A., has recently been delivering a course of lectures on "Dante's Paradise" in the city. These have been arranged by several of those who greatly appreciated a previous course on the "Divine Comedy," and have been well attended. On Sunday evening, May 25, Mr. Wicksteed occupied the pulpit of the Octagon Chapel. More than 400 worshippers assembled, and followed with close attention a thoughtful and earnest discourse on "Dante's Vision of Universal Peace."

Park-lane, Wigan: Shaw Memorial Schools Stone-laying. — On Wednesday, May 28, the foundation-stone of the Shaw Memorial schools, in connection with Park-lane Chapel, to be erected at a cost of about £2,000, was laid by the Rev. George Fox, who for many years was minister of the chapel. A procession of the Sunday-school and congregation, headed by the school banner and the band of the Lancashire Hussars, marched to the site, where the Rev. J. E. Stead, the present minister, who presided, was supported by the Revs. G. Fox, A. W. Fox, R. C. Moore, the Rev. H. Wilson, of Ashton Congregational Church, and the church officers. The Rev. J. E. Stead, in opening the proceedings, said they were thankful for the kindness of the friends who had long since gone from their midst, but who made it possible for them to have those schools, and it was very fitting indeed that the schools should bear the name of her through whose generosity their building was made possible. The laying of that foundation-stone was in itself symbolic of the task they sought to perform in the Sunday-school week after week. As they brought together the young children committed to their care, the one object they had before them, the one desire they held in their hearts, was to lay in them the foundation-stone of a useful, noble and pure life. They did not, perhaps, do so very much as others did in the imparting of a set theological teaching, but they did lay importance and stress upon what they, as Unitarians, regarded as a most necessary thing—character. They tried to instil into their young children the necessity of carrying into their daily life those principles of religion and morality which they learned week by week in the Sunday-school. The Rev. H. Wilson expressed the great pleasure he felt in taking part in the ceremony, and especially in meeting his old friend, the Rev. George Fox, again. A silver trowel was then presented to Mr. Fox by Mr. W. Britton, on behalf of the congregation, and Mr. Fox having acknowledged the gift, proceeded to lay the stone. He then gave an address, in which he referred to the old days of the chapel, originally built at a cost of something like £200, and contrasted this with the ampler gifts of recent years. He then spoke of the Shaw family once prominent in that district, of whom none were now left. He himself had long enjoyed the friendship of the brother and two sisters, who had been devoted to the cause of education, and the elder Miss Shaw had left some £1,500 for the purpose of erecting those schools. He referred also to the great interest in the work shown by the late Christopher Clark, whose son was still with them. The schools, he said, would be closely identified with the special work of Park-lane Chapel. That place would be indeed for the education of the children on Sunday. Meeting places were also required for schools in the week, assemblies of the people—it might be for recreation or for intellectual culture, or some deeper and higher interest—but the schools would be a most valuable help in the work of the chapel. The little room they saw over the road was taken as a Sunday-school in 1813. Then a little development was made, although the neighbourhood was but scantily inhabited in those days. Then another addition was made, and finally a great triumph was won when the top storey was built. By-and-bye those schools became too small for the needs of the church, and a great many of his friends could still remember with what zeal the members of that church worked in order to build schools on the other side of the chapel, and felt as if somehow they would be always adequate for their needs. The time had passed, those schools were out of date, they were not adequate for the work they had to do, but there would be these handsome and valuable schools for the work of the church. Those buildings would be also used as day schools. He was very glad indeed that the work of education, day school education, which had been interrupted for so long a period, was once more to be resumed. He was glad to think that the old place was once more to be identified not only with the religious interests of the place, but also with the secular interests, and that in the great work of national education that place was, as it were, in the vigour of youth, exercising a powerful influence with regard to the education of the people. The air was full of educational controversy now. He hoped and trusted that out of the opposition and through the counsels taking place some satisfactory measure would be produced which would settle the question of national education at least for a long period, so that our country should not only maintain its place commercially in the world, but should maintain its reputation for the more solid qualities which make the name of England great and illustrious in the world. Addresses were also given by the Revs. A. W. Fox and R. C. Moore, and votes of thanks to the Revs. G. Fox and J. E. Stead, followed by a hymn, brought the proceedings to a close. The collection amounted to £24 10s. Tea was afterwards served to a company of about 180.

Scottish Unitarian Sunday School Union.—Delegates were present from Aberdeen, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Kilmarnock, and Kirkcaldy, at the annual meeting held in Dundee on Saturday, May 31, in the hall of the Unitarian Christian Church. Mr. H. B. Melville, Kirkcaldy, the president of the Union, presided. Reports were submitted, which indicated a fair amount of progress, and addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Forrest, M.A., Glasgow; the Rev. E. T. Russell, Glasgow, and the Rev. Henry Williamson, Dundee.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe (Appointment).—The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Upperthorpe Chapel, in succession to the Rev. J. Ellis, now of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, Bethnal Green.

South Cheshire and District Unitarian Association and Sunday-school Union.—On Thursday, May 29, at Matthew Henry's Chapel, Chester, the annual meeting of this Association was held. Mr. R. Mansell (retiring President) occupied the chair, and there were representatives present from Chester, Crewe, Knutsford, Nantwich, and Shrewsbury. The Rev. H. E. Haycock (Chester) read the twelfth annual report of the committee, which recorded that the activity and usefulness of the Sunday-schools had been fully maintained. The report referred with sincere regret to the impending removal from the district of the Rev. R. S. Redfern, of Crewe. The visitors' reports were also submitted, and were of an encouraging character. The accounts, presented by Mr. A. Orrett, showed a balance in hand of £2 0s. 9d. On the proposition of the Chairman, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Street, the report and statement of accounts were unanimously adopted. A hearty vote of thanks was tendered to the retiring officers and committee. The Rev. J. C. Street as President and the other officers were then appointed, and the new draft rules were discussed and passed. At the close of the ordinary business the following resolution, moved by the Rev. J. K. Montgomery and seconded by the Rev. G. A. Payne, was unanimously adopted:—"That while rejoicing at any proposal to improve the education of the country and to co-ordinate all its branches under one authority, we are of opinion that the Bill submitted by the Government, in its destruction of School Boards directly elected by the ratepayers, and the substitution of an authority hardly in touch with the ratepayers—in its increased support of denominational schools without giving controlling power to those who pay rates and taxes; in its failure to provide proper training-schools for teachers of all denominations and in its increasing the funds of denominational schools and the powers of the clergy, and its diminution of the powers of the people, is not worthy of support, and should be radically amended or rejected by Parliament." The annual sermon was preached by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., who received the hearty thanks of the Association for services very highly appreciated and enjoyed.

Stockton-on-Tees.—The 214th anniversary of this church was held on May 25, the preacher being the minister of the church, the Rev. Henry Cross. At both services the congregations were very good, and special anthems were most excellently rendered by the choir. On Tuesday, May 27, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford, delivered his excellent lecture on "A Tour in Hungary and Transylvania," to a large and delighted audience. Alderman Rudd, J.P., presided. A conversazione was held on Wednesday, May 28, at which a large number were present. Mr. W. J. Watson, secretary of the congregation, presided, and said that one object of the gathering was to welcome the Rev. Henry Cross as the settled minister of the church. Short speeches were made by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who spoke with great feeling and inspiriting sympathy of his interest in the Stockton Church, and of signs of progress in the church, and added words of hearty welcome to Mr. Cross to the ranks of the Unitarian ministry, and the Rev. Francis Wood, of Sunderland, who joined in the welcome as a minister of the district. The Rev. Henry Cross responded, and spoke of the happy and united relations of the congregation at Stockton. A little later the Rev. J. A. Clark, minister of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Stockton, spoke as a brother minister of another denomination in the town. His words were full of generous sympathy, and of the spirit of the larger unity of the upward striving children of God. He said it gave him great pleasure to notice the signs of the times, the coming together of the long-estranged denominations, and that he was glad to be present to join in that welcome. A vote of thanks to the speakers, moved by Mr. D. P. Wright and seconded by Councillor J. Green, was acknowledged by the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, who expressed his delight at the presence and remarks of the Rev. J. A. Clark. They told of the larger unity at the back of all denominational divisions, and the broadening sympathies of modern thought—a breadth which was equally deep. On Sunday evening next the Rev. Henry Cross commences a series of open-air services in the Market-place for the summer months, after the evening church service.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Lord Mayor appeals to the citizens of London that to-morrow's collections for "Hospital Sunday" may be adequate to mark a memorable year, and to meet the growing needs of the hospitals, dispensaries, and convalescent homes of the wealthiest city in the world. One generous donor has offered to give a sum equal to one-fourth of the amount raised on Hospital Sunday, and the Lord Mayor asks for £100,000.

THANKSGIVING services for Peace were held last Sunday throughout the country, a vast congregation uniting with the King and Queen and other members of the Royal Family in the morning service in St. Paul's Cathedral, most impressive with its noble music. The sermon preached at that service by the Bishop of London, together with a number of other Peace sermons, by Churchmen and Nonconformists alike, will be found in this week's Christian World Pulpit. "Prayer rather than Boasting" was one of the notes of Dr. Horton's sermon, "The Heroic in Civil Life," of Mr. Jowett's. Hope from a magnanimous peace was a prevailing thought in many sermons. Of the Peace sermons of our own ministers we have reports of more than we can publish, and it goes without saying, that no pulpit was altogether silent on this great subject. The Executive Committee of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly of Nonsubscribing Churches, at their meeting, held June 6, passed the following resolution :—

That this Committee rejoice in the declaration of peace which has just been made, and earnestly commends the cause of international goodwill to the support of all members of the congregations in the Assembly.

WE have referred, in our leading article this week on the Education Crisis, to the great meeting of Londoners held in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening. On Wednesday a no less determined demonstration against the Government Bill was made in the Free Trade Hall, Manchester, at which Mr. James Bryce, M.P., was the chief speaker. The Bill, he said, would do nothing to meet the real and pressing educational needs of the time; its real inwardness was the plan to hand over the schools to the Church of England—no, to the clergy of the Church of England. The principles on which it was framed were unfit for a free country, a country which in the other civil relations of life placed Nonconformists and members of the Church of England on a level. If the Bill passed and the clerical party retained its control over the Board of Education, unsectarian schools would disappear and be replaced by sectarian schools, to be used to lead the child through the school to the Church, and to place all instruction in the hands of the clergy. There were a great many of the clergy, he hoped a majority of them, who did not desire that; but not one ought to be allowed so to use the school. They were told that the Church would use her power with moderation, and would deal indulgently with Nonconformists. They did not want indulgence, they wanted justice. The following was the resolution passed :—

That this meeting, assembled in the Free-trade Hall, Manchester, hereby earnestly protests against the Education Bill now before Parliament, because it strikes at the principle of religious equality, repudiates the right of direct control which should accompany payment of rates and taxes, fails to provide adequate representative management of schools, imposes civil disability on many whom it debars, by reason of sectarian tests, from entering the teaching profession, and finally it takes away from women the right to be directly elected to the educational authority.

THE last week in May was the occasion of several very interesting celebrations in Paris for our brethren of the Protestant Churches. The week's festival included the centenary of the establishment of Protestantism by Napoleon, then First Consul, under State recognition after the troubled times of the Revolution, the first Protestant service after the promulgation of the loi de Germinal having been held in Paris on April 25, 1802; the jubilee of the French Protestant Historical Society, established in 1852, having among its first members MM. Athanase Coquerel fils, A. Réville, A. Monod, Félix Pecaut, Charles Read, and Ch. Waddington; and the twenty-fifth anniversary of the establishment of the Faculty of Protestant Theology in the University of Paris, which, in 1877, took the place of the old Protestant Faculty of Strassburg, and has been made illustrious by the teaching of the late Auguste Sabatier.

ON Sunday, May 24, a service was held in the Oratoire to commemorate the re-establishment of Protestant worship in 1802. On the following day the jubilee meeting of the Historical Society was held, under the presidency of M. le Baron F. de Schickler, the faculties of Montauban and Geneva, as well as that of Paris, being represented, and also the London Huguenot Society. Among the Genevan representatives was our friend Professor E. Montet, Dean of the Theological Faculty. In connection with this celebration a most interesting historical exhibition had been arranged, especially commemorating the old days of Huguenot persecution.

THE celebration of the establishment of the Protestant Faculty in Paris University began with a service in the Oratoire on Thursday evening, May 29, when an eloquent discourse was given by Professor Jean Monnier, Sabatier's successor, and on the following afternoon a University meeting was held in the theatre of the Faculty, at which M. Leygues, the Minister of Public Instruction, presided, and made an extremely cordial speech. At this meeting the greetings of the Geneva University were presented by Professor Montet. M. Leygues assured the meeting of the Government's sympathy, and recognised the legitimate place of the Faculty in a national university, quoting the saying of Jules Ferry as to the important part played by Protestantism in France as the first declaration of Liberty, and the first form it had taken. Other celebrations followed, and in particular the warmest tributes were paid to the memory of Auguste Sabatier.

ENGLISH and American Congregationalists have been celebrating this week what the Christian World calls a "John Robinson Tercentenary" at Gainsborough. A "Robinson Memorial Church" has been built there, and with the help of generous contributions from America is declared to be free from debt. The report of the proceedings in the Christian World speaks of Robinson as having been pastor of the church at Gainsborough, but for this no evidence is adduced, and in this connection we ask the attention of our readers to the letter from the Rev. John Cuckson, the present Minister of the First Church of Plymouth, Mass., which will be found in another column. The tercentenary sermon was preached on Tuesday evening by Dr. Fairbairn, of Oxford, who in the Pilgrim Fathers, as champions of the spiritual forces of the gospel, had a congenial subject.

An address to the people of the Transvaal and Orange River State is being circulated for signature, and may be had from the Rev. J. Page Hopps, South Croydon, to whom signatures may also be sent. The address or message expresses profound sympathy for those who have lost their independence, and admiration for their heroism. It is also a frank confession (from Mr. Hopps's well-known point of view) of the wrong that has been done by this country, and concludes with the following forecast of the future:—

As in Australia and Canada, so in South Africa, the establishment of "a Sovereign Parliament" (as that in Canada is officially called) can only be a question of time. If so, you or your children will see a Federation of Free States which may realise even your most romantic aspirations. We hope so, and we believe that history will repeat itself in the creation of another United States—the United States of South Africa.

Not on the field of battle will that be won, but by the steady growth of a great democracy, of free institutions and of a resolute patriotism, which no grasping hand from without will be able to deprive of their ideals.

Accept our sympathy and brotherly and sisterly good wishes; and always remember that multitudes of friendly spirits in this Empire will watch your social progress with interest, and your political consolidation with hope. Advance, South Africa! and "follow the gleam" which will light you to your reward.

Following a suggestion of Dr. Horton's, the Rev. W. Stephens preached a special sermon in the Church of Our Father at Rotherham on Sunday week, in answer to the question, Why people do not go to church? and at the close of the service invited a conference on the subject. The sermon dealt in a direct and forcible manner with the various reasons which keep people away from public worship, and concluded as follows:—

The churches must first be Christianised before they can Christianise the world. They must cease to do as worldlings do, who do not own Christ as Master; cease their alliance with the unchristian spirit of the age, cease to be content to conform to the lower ethical standards, and to regard the principles of Christ as impracticable counsels of perfection. They must take a more resolute stand for Christ in all their daily dealings and in all matters of social and national righteousness. They must prove that they have more power at the ballot-box than the brewer and the gambler and the makers of war. They have to face the task of creating in non-church-goers an interest in religion. They can do that only by showing that they have a religion that is worth believing in and living for, and that they do believe it and live it. They must have a clearer vision of ideals, and be more faithful to them. They must exhibit more whole-hearted sincerity, more enthusiastic devotion. Fire makes fire. Interest generates interest. Life produces life. "Ye are the light of the world. Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in heaven."

Only two speakers responded to the invitation to discussion, of whom one, a member of the Masbro' Wesleyan Church, uttered some home truths as to the most unchristian spirit which too often prevailed in churches, and degraded the ideal of religious life.

The Visitor's address to the students of Manchester College, Oxford, at the close of the season, will be given on Thursday afternoon next, at 5 o'clock, by Dr. Edward Caird, the Master of Balliol, who succeeded the late Professor Max Müller as Visitor. At the Valedictory service in the College chapel, on the same evening, the welcome into the Ministry to the students who have completed their course is to be given by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Lewins Mead, Bristol.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

The coming Coronation looms more largely in the illustrated magazines this month than in the more substantial reviews, but in The Nineteenth Century and After will be found a picturesque article by Mr. E. S. Hope on "Some Bygone Coronation Processions," followed by a letter written by the only daughter of Lord Saye and Sele describing the Coronation of George IV. In those days the feast in Westminster Hall was a great function. The lady fortunately got her carriage to go home at midnight, but others did not till three in the morning. "The staircase was strewed with lawyers and aldermen who, having partaken too plentifully of turtle, were laying down unable to move, and groans of the snoring were heard." Clearly, some progress has been made since then. In the same number Mr. Sidney Webb writes on "London University: a Policy and a Forecast," showing what great opportunities await the new teaching university, both for undergraduates and graduates, and for original research. But for this money is required. "For five millions sterling—only half what has been given by a single benefactor to a single university in the United States—London's University can be fairly launched." Sir Joshua Fitch, in an article on "Some Possible Amendments to the Education Bill," points out the grave objections to that measure, both in the matter of machinery and in its failure to promote really efficient education; and as to the religious difficulty, it is is pointed out that this is not felt by Nonconformists alone.

An increasing number of statesmen and thinkers in the Establishment, as well as out of it, are of opinion that the State ought to abstain from attempts to serve the denominational interests of any section of the Christian Church. But the most militant Dissenters do not seek to identify the Board schools with the interests of any denomination, or even with the "dissidence of dissent." There is no evidence that the Nonconformists have ever tried to use the popular schools so as to teach nonconformity; while it is the avowed desire of the Church schools to teach Churchmanship. And herein lies the key to the main difference between those who contend for a truly national system of unsectarian instruction, and those who wish to frame a system which shall be specially adapted to meet the wishes of a religious denomination.

And the article concludes:—

No settlement of the education question can ever be permanent in this country which does not do much more than is here attempted, both to awaken and to satisfy the public demand for a truly liberal education, and which does not subordinate all sectional interests—ecclesiastical or otherwise—to the larger intellectual and moral interests of the nation as a whole.

The discussion on "Modern Trained Nurses" is carried on in three short papers—Miss M. F. Johnston replying to her critics of last month, and two other ladies adding their quota of criticism.

In the Contemporary Review social reformers should note Lieut.-Colonel Pedder's article on "Without House or Home," pleading for more security of tenure for agricultural labourers, and Mrs. Tanqueray's, on "Agricultural Gangs," arguing that such employment of girls were better forbidden. Mr. T. Joye has an interesting article on "The Reformed Church of France in the Nineteenth Century," describing the progress of the division between the Orthodox and Liberal sections of that church, and pointing to signs of possible reconciliation. Professor Pringle-Pattison writes on "Mr. Kidd on Western Civilisation."

In the Monthly Review, à propos of Coronation ceremonies and personages, there is an article on "The Great Lord Chamberlain," by Mr. J. Horace Round, followed by an article on "The Promotion of Trade within the Empire," by Mr. J. B. C. Kershaw, F.S.S. The illustrated article this month is on "Musical Instruments in Italian Pictures," by Mrs. Kemp Welch.

The magazines, as we have said, are more eager about the Coronation. The English Illustrated opens with an article on "The City and Coronations," with a quaint picture as frontispiece of the Coronation procession of Edward VI. in Cheapside. Good Words opens with an article on "Coronation Vestments," and the Woman at Home is resplendent as a special Coronation number. In the Sunday Magazine Miss Stone continues the narrative of her adventures "In the Grip of the Brigands."

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

III.—"FROM METHODIST TO UNITARIAN."

BY THE REV. G. V. CROOK.*

WHEN a minister passes from one of the so-called Evangelical churches to another—from the Presbyterian to the Baptist—from the Wesleyan to the Congregational—there is, as one has recently told us, little occasion for public comment. The lines of demarcation between these denominations have become so dim that to an increasing number they are becoming invisible. But when a minister passes from the Wesleyan Church with its definite and comprehensive "standards" to the so-called Unitarian Church, which has no creed whatever, and is in full sympathy with the most advanced thought and scholarship in the world, that step calls for a few words of public explanation.

Catholicity in the Wesleyan Church, but Ministers strictly bound.

The Wesleyan Church has always held to a broad catholicity, and, while having indicatory standards of truth, has never made those standards obligatory so far as its terms of communion are concerned, Wesley's terms of membership being remarkable as containing not a single dogmatic condition of communion—differing thus from almost every other contemporaneous body in ecclesiastical history. Dogmatic, therefore, as Wesley was himself, he seems to have perceived that unnecessary requirements of opinion are the most effectual means of provoking heterodoxy into existence; that the continual scenting out of heresy by the church is the surest means of producing it, as the persecution of doubtful opinions has usually strengthened and spread them. While he thus sacredly maintained the catholicity of church communion, he nevertheless made these standards a functional requisition—an obligatory condition of admission to the Methodist ministry, and thus for all time fixed the theology for the Methodist pulpit; hence at his ordination, every Methodist minister says: "I believe the system of doctrine therein contained (namely, in those fifty-two sermons) is in accordance with the Holy Scriptures." And at every May District Synod, in answer to the question, "Do you believe and teach our doctrines?" he replies, "I do believe and teach them." While many interpretations can be given (designedly or not) to the Thirty-nine Articles, it is difficult for anyone to misinterpret the obligatory standards for the Wesleyan minister, which have been admirably summed up in the "Five Points":—(i.) The natural impossibility of religion to fallen human nature—this, as W. L. Watkinson has told us, is the fundamental truth of all Methodism; (ii.) The perfect provision for this impossibility in the salvation procured and offered by Christ; (iii.) The sole condition of this salvation faith in Christ's provision; (iv.) The conscious witness of the spirit to this salvation; (v.) The eternal happiness and the eternal punishment of those who accept and of those who reject this salvation respectively. And so long as these sermons remain obligatory for the Methodist minister, we question our sincerity in occupying the Methodist pulpit while disbelieving any of them; for, if these dogmas are not necessary, as means of placing ourselves in right relations to God, or as means of bringing others into such right relations, then, as a leading Methodist has said, "the assertion of such dogmas as fundamentals and essentials in religion is a falsity and a moral wrong." While there is a "Broad Church" element in every sect to day, nothing to us seems so dishonourable as the open preaching of doctrines absolutely contrary to the unrevised creeds of the churches of which we are servants. The plain, obvious and central reason for having a creed is to make belief uniform and permanent—to prevent changes of faith. A creed is simply a tombstone set up to mark the point where men stop growing, and Wesley never intended to manufacture a vehicle of religious development that would carry the church beyond his own theological positions. He did not believe in a method for the outgrowth of his own ideas. Even he does not seem to have been conscious that a final church foregoes the future.

With a Creed, believe or leave.

Given the assumption of Methodism, that its scheme of theology is the final and absolute form of religious truth, we contend that a man should be loyal to the alternatives—believe or leave; and so long as a man sincerely believes the creed to which he subscribes, he must command universal respect. We are always glad to feel that there is a balance of truth in all creeds and a majority of saints in all communions. When, however, a minister has outgrown the creed to which he has subscribed, and rejects essential and important parts of it, the only honourable course is to resign that pulpit. When he ceases to believe the creed upon which the church is based, he is in honour bound to leave that church. It is sometimes assumed that because parts of a creed are a dead letter, therefore ministers are no longer under any obligation to preach them. But if they are dead, ought they not to be buried? Why subscribe, if not to teach? We may rejoice that a man has outgrown his creed, but we cannot rejoice when he has so outgrown the moral law that he ignores his ordination vow. No one has made true progress who is disloyal to the principles to which the pulpit in which he stands is dedicated. The most alarming sign of our times is the fact that any one should for a moment think or act otherwise. None of the great creed-churches have as yet publicly abandoned their fundamental dogmas; and until public authoritative disavowal is made, the pulpit is involved in dishonour if the creed is ignored. No general acquiescence in ignoring parts of a creed can warrant a man staying in that pulpit, part of the basis of which he disbelieves or ignores.

Ties which bind to the old Church.

There are others who find justification for remaining in a church whose creed they have outgrown, in their devotion to the continuity of history. They love the old church as an institution, and though they do not believe its doctrines, they cannot bear to break with it. The pursuit of truth is easy to the man who has no human sympathies, whose vision is impaired by no fond partialities, whose heart is torn by no divided allegiance; but the case is very different with the searcher whose affections are strong, whose associations are quick, whose hold upon the Past is clinging and tenacious. He may love Truth with an earnest and paramount devotion, but he loves much else also. He loves dogmas which were once full of strength and beauty to his thoughts, though now perceived to be baseless or fallacious. He loves the church where he worshipped in his happy childhood, but which inquiry has compelled him to abandon. The past and the familiar have chains and talismans which hold him back in his pursuit, till every fresh step forward becomes an effort and an agony; every fresh error discovered is a fresh bond snapped asunder; every new glimpse of light becomes a fresh flood of pain poured in upon his soul. This brings into prominence the grave evil inherent in all creed systems, which can only be abolished, not by ignoring one's ordination vow or disguising one's real belief, but by going to the root of the evil, and changing the constitution of the church. The church need not, and ought not, to have tied itself finally to any dogmas, and, so long as it does, personal integrity will be felt to be infinitely more precious than historical continuity, and even historical continuity itself only can be ours through keeping progress with the marching human race.

Obsolete Dogmatic Standards.

To-day it is universally felt among reflecting men that in proportion to the growth of a cultivated reason the dogmatic standards of the past become less and less adequate as charts of human belief, and there is noticeable here and there throughout Christendom a desire to recast and simplify those theological creeds. The theology of Methodism is, as yet, less powerfully affected by recent changes in the moral and intellectual condition of Christendom than other churches. When such men as W. L. Watkinson affirm that the world is still on the side of Wesley's theological creed we simply reply that thought has passed beyond it. Dr. Dale once said:—"The Methodists have not been predisposed to attempt the reconstruction of their theological theories, but whatever immunity they at present enjoy from the troubles by which we have been tried can be only temporary." It ought to be the constitutional duty of the church based on a creed to periodically revise that creed; but such a duty is never discharged till some crisis is reached grave enough to necessitate it. But has any church, in the sense required of altering a dogmatic basis, ever reformed itself from within? Every great birth or revolution of dogma had to constitute a new church as its organ. The Church of Rome would not take up the Anglican modifications, or the Anglican adopt the Puritan, the Quaker, the Wesleyan; and to-day, neither the Anglican, the Puritan, nor the Wesleyan will adapt themselves to the keynote of the new revival, which is sincerity.

The Church of the Future unbound by Creed.

The church of the future must have as its basis this principle, that the only method which does not tamper with veracity is to get rid of creed-subscription altogether. If Wesley had allowed the same catholicity for the minister as for the member in the Methodist Church, we believe it might have become—instead of its being, as it is to-day, the most conservative ministry in Protestantism—the great preparer of the human race for the next hour that is to strike. The prophet of the nineteenth century, Dr. James Martineau, wrote these words to me while I was a Methodist minister: "I also own great spiritual obligations to the life and literature of your Methodist communion, which I have ever loved and found congenial with the experiences of heart and conscience, though needing an amended interpretation for coherent thought." And it was because that freedom to amend the Wesleyan standards for coherent thought is denied to the Methodist minister—Wesley having legally fixed those standards for all his pulpits—that I felt bound to withdraw from it.

* A Paper read at Essex Hall on Thursday, May 22, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

An Undogmatic Church, misnamed Unitarian.

Dr. Martineau says that he "could not belong to any church or sect that was understood to pledge itself to the reception of any fixed dogmas or any immutable opinion, feeling that all stipulation, direct or implied, for specified agreement in theological opinion must be discarded from church union." These words contain the answer to the question—why I, when I withdrew from the Wesleyan Church, have joined the so-called Unitarian Church. I am unpledged to any creed, and have only to be loyally true to the best that can be thought and the fullest that can be known in science and in criticism, being always on the outlook for larger and clearer views of God, Truth, Duty and Immortality. I have always objected to any church being called by a doctrinal name, but especially it has seemed to me most unfortunate that the only church which is undogmatic in its basis has a dogmatic label. For instance, you must be a Trinitarian to be a minister in one of the orthodox pulpits; but you need not necessarily be a Unitarian in theology to occupy one of the so-called Unitarian pulpits, for, to make Unitarian doctrine essential to our church appears to me to imply a re-adoption of that very notion of "orthodoxy" which we profess to reject—a betrayal of our fundamental principle—our name ought to exclude what we refuse to be. It was with this consciousness that Dr. Martineau once said: "There is no such denomination as the 'Unitarian Body'; if there was, not for an hour would I belong to it." The same objection holds, I believe, to all such terms as "Our Faith," &c., because the extent of the deviation from the old theology among the so-called Unitarian churches is wholly undefined by accepted or unaccepted formulas.

Characteristic of a truly Catholic Church.

What is the distinctive characteristic which not only justifies my severance from Wesleyanism, but which also explains my attraction to you? Wesleyanism is "orthodox" or "dogmatic"—whether Trinitarian or Unitarian in theology is not the question—its basis being: "All differentiating development from ours is the road to ruin." You, on the other hand, are "undogmatic," though your name is at variance with your catholic basis, which is that—"All the Christian theologies may be found on the paths of salvation." The triumph of your principles would be not the ascendancy of one sect, but the harmony of all; your mission being, as Mr. Gow said characteristically yesterday, "to find the truth of God in all forms of faith." This distinction is unique in its magnitude. It is this utter break with the whole conception of an essential orthodoxy, this refusal to treat the various divergencies of human thought as a forfeiture of Divine love and Christian communion, which is your noblest characteristic and your most sacred heirloom; treating all development as the native blossoming of church life, its very essence, and therefore providing for it by latitude for that doctrinal growth which is often silent, like the emergence into a new season, piercing the irrational limitations and qualifications by which orthodoxy conceals the real meaning of the truths which most of its dogmas embody, and following the openings of the Spirit as you are divinely led. Having such a catholic basis you, nevertheless, refuse to embalm what has perished, and own that with nature, history and life so much expanded, only that church can meet the conditions of human life which has the adjustment for discharging from its terms what is perishable and obsolete, and permitting its indestructible truth to live on in new forms. Instead of the claim to finality, which is the basis of all the dogmatic churches, it is the consciousness of the absolute harmony of your position with the critical and scientific results of to-day, and also that your position will harmonise with all the critical and scientific results as yet undeveloped, that has given me the assurance that—under whatever name—you will command the future.

The Living Spirit in Progressive Thought.

This basis of the evolution of theology, the denial of which is orthodoxy, shadows forth for you a moral and intellectual harmony that can choose its own methods and borrow from all quarters, in scorn of consequence. "There is no heresy," says Dr. Martineau, "like that which denies this progressive unfolding of Divine Wisdom, and cannot see that He communes afresh with the soul of every age. Christianity is not a doctrine dead and embalmed in creeds, but a Living Spirit pealing through the whole life of our humanity and from age to age opening, as it were, new organ-stops within." In the words of John Hamilton Thom, "I am a Unitarian because I am not, and will not be, Sectarian; because I see clearly that the folds whose fences are speculative orthodoxies must always exclude some portion of the flock of Christ, and that the principle of the church universal, as laid down in Christ's prayer—that all men should be one with the Father even as he was—is simply the recognition of the Image of God in human nature." Having faith, then, "in God and" human "nature, I believe that in all ages every human heart is human; that in even savage bosoms there are longings, yearnings, strivings for the good they comprehend not; that the feeble hands and helpless groping blindly in the darkness touch God's right hand in that darkness, and are lifted up and strengthened." How to satisfy these spiritual and moral needs of humanity without either an Infallible Book or an Infallible Church, as Frances Power Cobbe has said, is the problem which lies before us.

With clear and strong Convictions trust the open Future.

True and vital, therefore, as we would hold our beliefs, we refuse to fasten them on our sons as a condition of entering our churchly heritage, having no blind expectation of perpetuity for the present types and classifications of theology—all of which are imperfectly adapted to the various wants of humanity, some to its mode of thought, others to its mode of feeling; but in pure faith that God and the human soul will ever seek each other—the unpledged mind simply unfolding the present life of God in the present life of man. Accepting, then, the religion of Jesus, we hold, in accordance with his teaching, that practical religion is summed up in love to God and love to man.

Robert Louis Stevenson has beautifully described my convictions in one of his parables where he tells us of the man who went forth into the world to find "the touchstone of the trial of truth." After having found several, all professing to be the only true one, he at last found a clear pebble that had no beauty and no colour. He looked upon it scornfully and shook his head, saying "It will only be like the rest," but he took it and rode away. Presently he tried the new touchstone on the others. Now in the light of each other all the touchstones lost their hue and fire, and withered like stars at morning; but in the light of the pebble their beauty remained, only the pebble was the most bright. And the traveller cried, How if it be the truth that all are a little true? And he took the pebble and turned its light upon the heavens, and they deepened about him like the pit; and he turned it on the hills, and the hills were cold and rugged, but life ran in their sides so that his own life bounded; and he turned it on the dust, and he beheld the dust with joy and terror; and he turned it on himself, and he knelt down and prayed.

We bless thee for the growing light,
The advancing thought, the widening view,
The larger freedom, clearer sight,
Which from the old unfolds the new.

BLACKFRIARS MISSION COUNTRY COTTAGE.

SIR,—May I ask you to insert a few words on behalf of the Blackfriars Mission Country Cottage.

A suitable house in a capital situation on Mitcham Common has been found, but it was necessary to take it for the whole year, which involves a larger expenditure on rent than hitherto, even if it is sub-let for the winter months. As treasurer I should like to feel assured of a sufficient income to provide for emergencies, and would remind those who are interested in this branch of the Mission work that contributions to it would be gratefully received.

LITERATURE.

THROUGH SCIENCE TO FAITH.*

DR. NEWMAN SMYTH has long been recognised as one of the ablest and most candid of the liberal religious thinkers of America; and his last book, "Through Science to Faith," is likely to cause much dismay among those of "the orthodox" who are looking backward and not forward.

The author's purpose is not at all a novel one—to investigate the support which Theism may derive from the doctrine of Evolution. But one of the striking aspects of his argument is his frank abandonment of the Natural Theology of the deistic or Paleyan Type, which sought for evidences of design in the details of Nature, and for a God who was a "Wise Architect," i.e., a clever contriver. Dr. Smyth's attitude to the scientific doctrines embraced under the term Evolution resembles that of Professor Fiske; and his book affords further illustration of what the present writer has ventured to affirm elsewhere,† that no argument "from Nature to Nature's God" can have any force to-day unless it rests on the principle that an effect cannot contain more than the cause which produced it. The great world-power can bring forth only what it has in itself already. This point of view is stated in the volume before us as plainly as could be desired:—

> We begin by accepting clearly and positively the great generalisation of the nineteenth century's science; namely, the genetic unity and the unbroken development of the whole realm of Nature to which we also belong (p. 22; italics mine).
> Evolution is a progressive revelation. The method of revelation in evolution is marked by these two related characters—it is an opening forth from within of the powers and promise of the creation; and it is further a progressive disclosure of them (a growing capacity to apprehend them). Evolution, as one continuous course of Nature, contains always both prophecies and fulfilments. Each successive chapter brings out further the meaning of preceding chapters, and points also to something to be made known in coming chapters. Evolution is a novel with a plot (p. 39).

This passage reminds us, almost verbally of Tyndall's famous address before the British Association in Belfast in 1874. After an interval of twenty-eight years, the British Association is meeting in Belfast once more; and we may affirm that if Tyndall's address were to be given again, its main positions would be accepted by clergy and educated laity alike as a matter of course.

To complete our indication of Dr. Smyth's general point of view we may quote one passage more. Speaking of the "double method of natural revelation," he says:—

> Generalising it and stating it as a law of natural revelation, we have this principle: there is first progress in the development of the subject-matter which is to be known; and, secondly, there is progress in the faculty by which the matter to be disclosed may be known; and thirdly, there is finer correspondence between these two. Evolution is at last revelation of formed nature to mind grown capable of apprehending it.

Does Dr. Smyth mean to contrast Evolution as "natural revelation" with some kind of "supernatural" revelation? Evidently not; for he not only speaks of how much further this principle of natural revelation may carry us, in suggesting the possibility of "some fairer and further disclosure of Nature" to beings more highly developed than we are, with minds better fitted to receive it; he also speaks of "carrying this line of thought to its further issues in recognition of the same principles of revelation throughout human history" (pp. 47, 48).

We may notice, in passing, the suggestive application which the author makes of his basal principle in his chapter on "The Significance of the Beautiful." The current doctrine among biologists and physiologists is that Beauty in Nature is utilitarian only. Dr. Smyth criticises this view, and holds that "Beauty is its own excuse for being"; it is a "revelation of the Intelligence that thinks it and loves it to the mind in us which may perceive it and delight in it." He brings a most adequate equipment of biological knowledge to the defence of his principle, of an evolving world progressively revealed to evolving minds; and the greater part of the book (which contains much useful scientific information) is devoted to the consideration of the various lines of "Direction in Nature," along which this double evolution can be traced.

We have already come near the limits of space permitted for the review of a book like this; but we cannot close without commenting on one point of supreme importance, arising out of the chapter on the "Moral Character of Direction in Nature," where Dr. Smyth comes in contact with the problem of evil. We are here face to face with the facts on which John Stuart Mill's indictment of Nature is based:—

> Nature impales men, breaks them as if on a wheel, casts them to be devoured by wild beasts, burns them to death, crushes them with stones like the first Christian martyr, starves them with hunger, freezes them with cold, poisons them with the quick or slow venom of her exhalations.

And the recent frightful tragedies, which have horrified the civilised world, only give renewed force to such thoughts. It seems to us that what Dr. Smyth says here would have great value if only he had worked out more fully the legitimate conclusions of his own statements. "If there is benevolent character in evolution," he tells us, "it will naturally reveal itself in a steady enhancement of vital values; we should search for indications of it in life's increasing worth" (p. 116). The tendency of "the Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed" is to bring forth forms of life which have more intrinsic worth when judged by their natural powers and possibilities. And by this steady increase of "vital value" we estimate the "beneficent" tendency of the Infinite and Eternal Energy. What Dr. Smyth does not clearly point out is that if we adopt this point of view—if we estimate the worth of a life, and, therefore, the beneficence of its Creator, by the innate capacities of the life—we are precluded from taking mere pleasure or mere pain as the standard by which to estimate its worth. Pleasure and pain are only aspects of any creature's life, even among the lower animals, and we cannot judge the worth even of a beast's life by something that is only a part or a single aspect of its life. Hence we are delivered from the endless dispute which arises from basing the question of the Divine "beneficence" on the question whether the pleasures of sentient life overbalance the pains, or vice versâ. Are Emerson, Wordsworth, Martineau right, or Schopenhauer, Byron, Mill? On this question of quantity of pleasure in life versus quantity of pain the result is always inconclusive. How could such a question be settled but by one whose experience embraced all lives of all living things from the lowest to the highest? But, as Mill himself said, unconsciously rejecting the whole "pleasure or pain" view of life: "It is better to be a human being dissatisfied than a pig satisfied; better to be Socrates dissatisfied than a fool satisfied. . . . A being of higher faculties requires more to make him happy, is capable probably of more acute suffering, and is certainly accessible to it at more points, than one of an inferior type; but in spite of these liabilities, he can never really wish to sink into what he feels to be a lower grade of existence." There is, then, a standard of worth in life which is different from the standard of pleasure or pain; and, judged by the former of these standards, life is worth living, and evolution is itself a progressive realisation of what is good.

EDUCATION IN IRELAND.*

THE Royal Commission on Irish University Education, may be trusted to know its own business, and has, of course, a perfect right to decline to hear any one whom it judges to have no real contribution to make to the work it has in hand. It declined to hear Mr. O'Donnell, and as he believed he had important testimony to offer, he was very angry. He, therefore, wrote out what he would have laid before the Commission, and it is here presented to us with the title, "The Ruin of Education in Ireland." Since the publication of the book the newspapers have reported that Mr. O'Donnell has "appeared before the Commission"; and Mr. O'Donnell has explained that he was indeed summoned to London, and to the room in which the Commissioners sat; but he was still not allowed to speak, but was merely told that his book had been received. It will be, as it ought to be, a source of consolation and satisfaction to him that his book is finding a pretty wide public, and that the general judgment evidently grants him a right to be heard upon the question at large.

He speaks from the position of a Nationalist who cannot work with his own party, and a Catholic who condemns the methods of his own Church. His frankness is refreshing, his language breezy. His great bugbear is the Jesuits; it is they that have done the mischief; they bring disaster with them inevitably; and if you set up in Ireland a Catholic University they will get hold of that also, and you will only further enrich them and do no good for education. Help, rather, to beat the Jesuits back; rescue educational work from their control; demand to see their accounts; restore the influence of the Catholic laity; make the profession of the schoolmaster to be again an honourable one; strengthen the Queen's Colleges; Ireland's salvation is in mixed education. Catholic and Protestant youth side by side, meeting in the same class-rooms, contending for the same prizes, learning to respect one another. Why not, Mr. O'Donnell asks; and he has plenty of evidence to show that all the talk about the "danger" of mixed education, danger of the perversion of young Catholics by young Protestants, is insincere, and he speaks of it with that old candour which, in the spacious days of his Parliamentary career, used to cause his suspension from the service of the House.

But what will the Church say about all this? A conversation between Mr. O'Donnell and Cardinal Logue would be delightful to listen to. It is to be feared, however, that Jesuitry would have very little difficulty in disposing of the only thing in Mr. O'Donnell's book that looks at all like a principle — namely, that the priests should confine themselves to the domain of "faith and morals" and let education alone. It would hardly appear that that is the way out of our difficulties. The clergy of no Church would be willing to abide by such a decree. What would our own ministers say if they were told to consider the education of the young as outside their sphere?

Still, what Mr. O'Donnell says needed saying, and the fears to which he gives expression are the very misgivings which many earnest and thoughtful people have about the Catholic University it is proposed to create. It is a mistake to suppose that, even in Ulster, our Protestant people "hate" the Romanists, and it is a mistake to say they "fear" them. What is in their minds is a determination not to strengthen the power of the priests for a control that has become an oppression. And what they are asking is, "Can you guard against that, and at the same time remedy Ireland's grievance in the matter?" It is this that touches the very core of the problem of Irish University education.

THE Sunday School Association has done a helpful thing in publishing these "Simple Talks." The preface warns "critical and literary people" that the book is not for them. "It is purposely written in unconventional style, and as near to everyday language as may be." How far its unconventionality goes may be fairly represented by two brief quotations. In the chapter on "Repentance," Mr. Hawkes tells of a boy who started off early in the morning to go to some races, although his father had forbidden him to go. On the road he fell in with a number of other lads and men bent on the same errand, and was so disgusted by their joking and foul language, that he realised what he was doing and turned back.

He remembered all the love and kindness he always found at home, and the thought of his ingratitude in disobeying his father and mother was so painful that he just turned round and started walking back the way he had come. He got in at the back door, which he had left unbolted, before his mother got down, and he went to his room. He was a big boy, but tender-hearted, and he didn't know whether to laugh or to cry—to laugh at his own folly or to cry at his perversity; but anyway, he sat on his bed and thought a great deal, until he just slipped down on his knees, and told God he was sorry, and would try to be wiser in future. Then he went down to breakfast, and told his father and mother just the same, and started off to his work feeling a lot happier.

And in a section of the last chapter, on "Death and Immortality," Mr. Hawkes has told of the happy thoughts we should have about death, in spite of the inevitable sorrowful partings, since God is indeed our Father, and he concludes:—

> The better we learn our lessons here, and the higher up we shall start in the new life. The more we neglect them, and the sadder and darker will be our new start. How foolish we are to waste time and strength in sin and disobedience here. Let us arise, and go to our Father right off.

It will thus be seen that the title gives a true description of the book. From beginning to end we are listening to an earnest and genial teacher, as he talks to his boys and girls about religion. He wants them to care about religion, and understand what it really means. He wants them to be saved from beliefs that are "puzzling, contradictory, and superstitious," so he frankly explains from point to point, why a thoughtful Unitarian cannot accept many of the doctrines of orthodoxy, and points out how hurtful they are and opposed to the profound spiritual teaching of Jesus, while at the same time he makes clear the great doctrines of a reverent Christian Theism.

One slip we may note in passing. In the fourth chapter, an answer is given to the question, "What is the Christian Religion?" "It is the religion of Jesus, who was called by his followers the Christ, or Messiah, of God." And explaining the meaning of the name, or rather the title, "Christ," Mr. Hawkes tells of the old Jewish expectation of a King who was to come, with special authority from God: "They called him, in Greek, the Christ, or 'the Anointed,' and, in Hebrew, 'Messiah,' or 'the One Sent.'" But the Hebrew Messiah means anointed, exactly as Christ does, which is its Greek equivalent.

The Talks begin with the meaning of Religion and our thought of God, showing what is implied in our trust in Him as our Heavenly Father. Then come sections on Human Nature, the Holy Spirit, Inspiration, and on Sin and Repentance, dealt with in a direct and wholesome manner. The Bible and the Christian Religion, Jesus and the Kingdom of God, are the subjects of the next two chapters, and then follow explanations of the purpose of a Church and the meaning of a Free Church, what the duties of Church and State are, and what ministers are for. Worship and Preaching and the "Sacraments—so-called," are also among the subjects touched upon, and the concluding chapter is on "The Culture of the Soul, Death and Immortality, Eternal Life."

There are, if we mistake not, many teachers who will welcome this little book, if not for actual use in class, at least as a real help to them, as guidance and suggestion for talks of their own on the great subjects dealt with. It will also do good service, if put into the hands of thoughtful boys and girls, who are beginning to ask questions about religion, and would be glad to listen to the instruction of this friendly voice.

LEARNING TO READ.

ON Monday evening that veteran teacher, Mr. A. Sonnenschein, gave a lecture in the Board-room of the offices of the London School Board, Victoria Embankment, which was filled by a large audience of elementary school teachers. How children ought to be taught to read is a subject to which Mr. Sonnenschein has devoted a large amount of time and thought during the last fifty years, and he is strongly impressed by the economic waste of defective systems, which keep children for three or five years over a task that may be happily completed, by careful use of a right method, in one year. This was the subject of his lecture on Monday, in the course of which he gave a brief survey of his new set of reading books, "Reading in a Twelvemonth," illustrating the principles on which the series of lessons have been arranged. English, like French, he pointed out, must be taught on the syllabic method; and if what appeared to be the many anomalies of the language were carefully considered, it would be seen that for the most part they could be reduced to rules not difficult to master, in a properly graded course. A description of Mr. Sonnenschein's system will be found in some articles reprinted from the St. James's Gazette and other papers, in an advertisement of the series of reading books, published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.

At the conclusion of Mr. Sonnenschein's lecture questions were invited, and one lady teacher, clearly of great capacity, made an interesting speech on the subject. They owed a great debt of gratitude to Mr. Sonnenschein, she said, for the work he had done in classifying the words of the language, and if this classification could be separately printed it would be of great service to teachers. But as to the series of reading-books, she thought it a drawback that for small children so large a vocabulary was crowded into one year; the field of knowledge thus opened up was too vast for them, and, in particular, there were too many abstract words, the meaning of which children could not grasp. The wearisome drill of words should be as far as possible humanised, the words being woven into interesting stories. Of the two systems, the logical and the psychological, the latter was best in teaching children. It was a noble thing that Mr. Sonnenschein had devoted fifty years to the attempt to simplify learning for children. It was part of the true self-surrender of life that such a worker should see his principles taken by others, to be worked out in their own way. She was not sure that one uniform system would be best in all their schools.

The new series of Reading Books, we may add, is a great improvement on the old, and more attractive to children.

THE June number of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day contains two addresses to children on "The Holy Grail." In the Mill Hill Pulpit the Rev. Charles Hargreve's sermon is on "A Sign in Heaven: The Lesson of the new star in Perseus."

OBITUARY.

MR. JOHN HUNTON SMITH.

MR. J. HUNTON SMITH, who passed away on 5th inst., after a few days' illness, at Birkenhead, at the age of eighty-three, was an esteemed member of the Unitarian congregation there, and a most regular attendant at its services and social gatherings. Born, educated, and trained for business in Yorkshire, Mr. Smith removed in early life to Liverpool, where he was attracted by the preaching of the Rev. James Martineau, and under his influence adopted Unitarian opinions. He then commenced business at Carmarthen, and became a member of the congregation there, under the ministry of the Principal of the Presbyterian College, Dr. Lloyd, who subsequently married one of Mr. Smith's sisters. For forty years he took an active interest in congregational affairs, until his retirement from commercial engagements, when he went to reside at Birkenhead, where his wife (a Miss Cowling, of York) died, and where he afterwards married the lady who survives him.

From early youth Mr. Smith was an enthusiastic admirer of Carlyle, with whose works few general readers had a more intimate acquaintance.

The remains were cremated at Anfield, where the funeral service was conducted by the Rev. James Crossley, who also made appreciative allusion to the deceased in his discourse on the following day.

THE LATE MISS ROWLAND.

ON Thursday evening, June 5, a memorial service was held in the Congregational Church, Neath, in memory of the late Miss Rowland. The mayor and members of the corporation, and nearly all the ministers of the town, with representatives from the various churches, united in the service, and about 1,000 people were present. The Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Unitarian minister, Swansea, conducted a most impressive service and delivered a touching address, dwelling on Miss Rowland's life and work.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Packing for a Journey.

I WAS reading this morning Jesus's instructions to his twelve friends whom he was sending on a journey. You will find the story in the tenth chapter of Matthew, beginning at the fifth verse. And if you will read on for seven verses you will see—first, that they were to make this journey in their own neighbourhood, among people they knew something of, and whose ways they understood. That is a good way for us to begin our travels. First find out what is to be learned or enjoyed near home; and if we have anything to teach, let us try first to teach it to those around us rather than to those at a distance whose ways and ideas we do not understand.

Then they had a definite purpose in this journey; and that, again, is one of the best ways of making a journey interesting—to know just what we mean to do in it. Also they were to take every occasion of helping any one who needed their help in this journey—of being useful and kind as they went. And this you will also find an unfailing way of making a journey pleasant.

Lastly, they were always to be quiet and courteous to every one, and expect to find others friendly, which is still the best way of finding or making other people friendly.

But it is not of any of these directions I want to speak now. What struck me most was Jesus's counsel to these friends about packing for their journey. I suppose this interested me so much because this last week I had been so much interested in the packing of a young friend who was going to America. But you all know that the packing for a journey is one of the first and most necessary things for us to think of when we are going to take one. What shall we take? What must we take? What can we do without? We begin by thinking of all the things we should like to take, and end by seeing how little we can get on with.

Well, these directions of Jesus will certainly, if you think of them, sound strange to you. Don't take any money with you, he says. Why, that is the very first thing we think of. Don't take a portmanteau. Don't take a change of clothing. Don't take anything whatever. Simply, go.

If we could only manage to travel that way, I often think it would be the pleasantest way of all; not to have any encumbrance, not to have any luggage to look after. I notice that old travellers generally travel with a great deal less than young travellers, and that most people come back from a journey saying, "We didn't really need half the things we took."

Still, we do need to take some things with us, and the pleasure and the profit of our journey will largely depend on their being just the right things.

Then, again, what are the right things will depend on where you are going, and what you are going for. You may be going to India or to Iceland, you may be going for business or for health or for pleasure, and in each case you would want a somewhat different outfit. My young friend was going to America, and it really didn't make much difference what he took, because in America you can get anything you want—boots, hats, shirts, handkerchiefs—just as you can here. But there are parts of the world where one must take his own supplies with him; if he hasn't a thing he must do without it, and then all depends on his having thought out wisely beforehand what is really necessary. Really necessary, I say, because it is in just such circumstances as that one has to cut out everything superfluous. If you want to see how little is necessary to men with brave hearts in such circumstances, read Nansen's "Crossing of Greenland," when some day you come upon it.

Very likely you may not go to Greenland or to India or to America. But there is one journey, a long and in some ways an unknown journey, you will certainly take—indeed, you have started on it now—the Journey of Life. And there is a packing to be done for this journey. You are beginning it now. I wonder what you are packing. I wonder what the things are that you are going to take with you all through this journey.

Most of you are going to school. Perhaps you can think of something you are getting there to take with you. Knowledge? Yes. That is a necessary thing to take with you—the more of it the better. That is truly a capital thing to take. You can pack so much in so little room—whole bookfuls of it, libraries of it, can all be packed in those little brains of yours. There is no limit to what they will hold. This knowledge doesn't take up any space, it doesn't weigh anything; you don't have to look after it, you don't have to pay on it. The only thing you need do is to put it away in good order, so that you can put your hand on it when you want it.

And you are packing every day something we call Habits. There is the habit of being punctual; the habit of being attentive, of putting one's whole mind on what you are now about; the habit of being polite; the habit of being cheerful; the habit of not demanding too much of other people. There is the habit of taking life pleasantly—of making the best of what you have, and of those around you; the habit of hoping; the habit of trusting; the habit of loving. Every day you are putting away, packing up something that is going along with you through this journey of life. You are storing up the equipment you are going through life with.

I wonder if you are packing things that are going to be useless or troublesome to you. So many boys and girls do. Unpleasant dispositions, careless or wilful ways, foolish fancies; the habit of wanting everything they see; the habit of expecting everybody to give up to them; the habit of discontent; the habit of grumbling. Do not pack any of these among the things you take. They will be more and more of a nuisance the farther you go. How many people I have known whose lives were a disappointment to themselves and every one else, just because they did not pack the right things when they were young! They left out the things they were going really to need, and put in things they were sure to outgrow, things of no manner of use to them, but rather a burden and a plague—a great pack of useless wants and troublesome habits.

And then there is another journey we shall certainly all take. After the journey of life, the journey of death. And the words of Jesus to his twelve friends going on a journey do exactly fit the case here, for we do not take any money with us on this journey, nor change of clothing, nor anything but just ourself—just what we are. All through our life, in a sense, we are packing for this journey; we are making our character, we are storing away all the time what grows into us, what becomes us.

You would think a traveller foolish who was always picking up and packing up things that could not pass the frontier. So foolish are we when we do not choose by preference the things that will pass the frontier and go with us on our new journey—the things that become ourselves.

Fill up each hour with what will last,
Buy up the moments as they go;
The life above when this is past
Is the ripe fruit of life below.

LONDON, JUNE 14, 1902.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

THE great and representative meeting of citizens of London, held in the Queen's Hall on Tuesday evening, under the presidency of Lord ROSEBERY, to consider the Education Bill, was an unmistakable sign of the strength of the resentment and the determined opposition aroused by the proposals of the Government. Dr. Clifford, who spoke late in the meeting, said that passing through the length and breadth of the land in the service of their cause, he found everywhere that the temperature was rising, people were thoroughly awake to the gravity of the situation, and protest was daily gathering force; every progressive force, Nonconformist, educational, trade-unionist and co-operatiqe, was united and enthusiastic against the Bill; and Dr. GUINNESS ROGERS, of whom Mr. ASQUITH spoke as that veteran leader of the Old Guard of Nonconformity, declared that while last Sunday they had been deeply moved by the great service in St. Paul's of Thanksgiving for Peace, they had now entered on another war, and he warned the Government that in this case also they had utterly miscalculated the force of the resistance they would have to meet.

On Thursday a deputation on this subject from the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches was to be received by Mr. BALFOUR, and while the result will not be known until after these lines are in type, we may be sure that their protest will be uttered with no uncertain sound; and the same uncompromising condemnation of the Bill we find in the special Report of the Committee, from which we shall presently quote some passages, also presented on Thursday to the Provincial Assembly of our churches in Lancashire and Cheshire.

The mind of the Queen's Hall meeting was expressed in the following resolution, moved by Mr. LYULPH STANLEY and seconded by Dr. GUINNESS ROGERS :—

"That this meeting of citizens of London declares its adhesion to the principle of efficient, free, and unsectarian education in schools maintained at the public expense and managed by the directly elected representatives of the people, and calls upon its members in Parliament to oppose strenuously the present Education Bill."

And the essential points of the protest were further tersely expressed in two letters read by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE at the beginning of the meeting. Sir HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN wrote :—

It is quite enough to say that the Bill seeks to crush the healthy and democratic School Board, and fosters the inefficient but privileged Committee; that it favours sectarian schools under clerical control, and levies rates while ignoring the rights of the ratepayers; that it does nothing to maintain or extend higher education; that it fails to provide for the training of teachers, and leaves that great profession mainly closed against any but one sect; that it, in fact, hinders the establishment of a really national system.

And Mr. JAMES BRYCE wrote :—

I rejoice that such energetic efforts are being made to explain to the nation the disastrous results which must flow from this Education Bill should it, unfortunately, be carried. It is not only unjust in its ecclesiastical aspect, and useless in its educational aspects, but it violates the fundamental principle of civil self-government by granting pecuniary support from local funds without local public control. That which elementary education most needs at this moment is popular interest, popular sympathy, popular support. The Bill removes us further than ever from those vital forces which are essential to a truly national and effective system of education.

The speeches of the evening, which in very varied tone maintained a high level of eloquence and unmistakable earnestness, served to illustrate and enforce these points. The love of liberty and of religious equality and justice, no less than the desire for genuine progress in a truly national system of education, found full expression in the speeches and met with immediate response from the vast audience.

Lord ROSEBERY denounced the Bill as calculated to do more to stunt the educational development of the country at a moment when it required inspiration and development than almost any measure that he could conceive possible, and it was in his view idle to hope that it could be effectually amended, in the interest either of effective education or of justice to Nonconformists, because in that case the very spirit of the Bill would be gone, and the Government would have lost the greater part of the support now given to it. Their only course therefore was strenuous opposition, on the three main grounds of the necessity for popular control, religious equality, and educational efficiency.

This was the burden also of Mr. ASQUITH's speech, who declared that the action of the Government was a deliberate throwing away of a priceless opportunity of building up, on the lines and in the spirit which the conditions of our time and country require, of a great and really national system of education. No one, he said, was satisfied with the existing state of things; but what the Government ought to have done was to unfetter and encourage the great School Boards, and in country districts to group the parishes in fair-sized administrative areas, which would secure more capable management and ampler means of support, and to insist that there should be genuine popular management. On this point he quoted a former declaration of the Archbishop of CANTERBURY'S, when as an educational authority and reformer he served on a Royal Commission :—"The im-important thing, if you want to make education efficient in a country like England, is to associate with the management and control local interest and local sentiment."

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Lady O'HAGAN, and Dr. CLIFFORD were also among the speakers, and Canon BARKER added a protest of peculiar significance against the Bill as both unjust and impolitic, gaining pecuniary advantage for the Voluntary schools at too great a cost. It would do nothing to promote the truly national system of education to which they looked forward, and it would promote sectarian animosity, which was good neither for religion nor for education.

The Report of the Provincial Assembly Committee, above alluded to, having described the present condition of our educational system in this country, speaks in the following terms of the Government Bill :—

It is under these conditions that the Education Bill is brought in; and, with all its specious endeavours to throw dust in the eyes of the English people and to appear as a Bill placing secondary education in the forefront of its purpose, and establishing one authority for all education, secondary and elementary, the Education Bill, in its inception and in its ulterior aim, and in its whole inspiration, is a Voluntary Schools' Relief Bill and a Voluntary Schools' Multiplication Bill; and the whole gist of it is found in the destruction of School Boards. There never was a Bill with a more fallacious appearance. There is in it a show of fairness all round; any sect that can find thirty scholars can have a school of its own, opening up the prospect of the multiplication of little inefficient denominational nurseries of the sectarian spirit; but Nonconformists will not look at such a scheme; and the authors of the Bill know it; and they know that, by this Bill, they are aiming simply at capturing the rates for the schools of the Church of England and the Roman Catholics; they not only propose to lay anew a compulsory Church rate, but also to charge the rates with the cost of Roman Catholic propagandism; and these are the essential features in the Bill. The abolition of School Boards and their replacement by County Councils and Municipalities is all a means to this end; the School Board rates cannot be diverted to denominational schools; therefore the School Boards must go, and the County and Town Councils must take their place; and the clerical schools, remaining in clerical hands, while popular control is limited to one-third of the managers, are to be entirely maintained by rates and taxes. It is the most reactionary measure of education ever laid on the table of the House of Commons, a flagrant breach of the principle of control by the ratepayers of the expenditure of their own rates, and it is a grievous wrong to the consciences of Nonconformists compelling them to pay rates for denominational teaching to which they object.

And in a further passage of the Report it is said:—

The outlook for education is very dark; the clock is to be put back; the children are to be handed over to the clerics in future; the free breath of the nation's life, and the healthy, invigorating influence of popular control of schools belonging to the people are to disappear by degrees. Sectarianism is to be rampant in elementary education, and thus one of the greatest evils in English life is to be cherished and fostered; while education will, as it always has done, wither and decline under the hand of the priest. It is in the interests of education that the protest against this Bill is entered.

SINCERITY, THE KEYNOTE OF THE COMING REVIVAL.*

BY THOMAS J. HARDY, B.A.

I AM to speak to-night of what I believe to be the keynote of the coming revival. That there are signs both negative and positive of a quickening of individual and national life I firmly believe. Our very apathy as a nation indicates the profoundness of our discontent; while in all directions there are those who are turning away as far as in them lies from this artificial, complicated, luxurious travesty of life to find for themselves and others the priceless boon of simplicity and peace.

At the same time the word "revival" will not do, because there is nothing within the whole annals of English religious history that I desire to see "revived," nor is there any church extant to-day the mere revival of whose traditions I can conceive as bringing us forwarder. I may as well say this at once, thankful for a platform sufficiently broad to admit of my saying it. What have "revivals" been? From Wyclif to Newman they have consisted in the imposition of duties and emotions having their centre apart from the actual life of men and women. I am not quarrelling with them, I am not denying they have made for righteousness; I merely say that we do not want them again, nor anything like them.

A New Birth of Genuine Life.

We do not want the fanning of any external flame, we want that the Divine life within may be liberated and realised; and the awakening to which we look forward with the earnest expectation of those who of old waited for the Kingdom of God, will consist, not in the asseveration of some doctrine, not in additions to an already overstocked religious phraseology, not in the creation of new duties to depreciate still further—if that be possible—the value of the common task, not in the re-dressing of the Past that the nakedness of the present may be more basely apparent, not in a sensational supernaturalism to alienate men still more from the loveliness of earth and the sanctity of the common day, not in church reform, or chapel reform, not in any of those things popularly associated with the word "religion" to-day; but in the idealisation, and, therefore, realisation of the common life, in the release of all noble instincts, in the consecration and gladness of common toil, in the sense of the Divine everywhere lovingly present, in the opening of the eyes of the blind to the light and beauty and joy already here, and the opening of the prisons to them that are bound alike in poverty and superfluity.

Simplicity, Sincerity, Service.

And three things will characterise this new life: Simplicity, or the simplifying of life in its aims, interests, and possessions so that Life may be dominant; and Sincerity, or the harmony of all external life and utterance with this internal aim and conviction; and Service, without which even Simplicity and Sincerity are helmless and vain and avail nothing, inasmuch as Love is lord and king.

And when this threefold ideal—Simplicity, Sincerity, Service—is beloved of men, and their minds are set and stayed upon it, so that the deformity and artificiality, the loudness and bigness, the hollowness and wastefulness of this present time shall have become intolerable to them, and they gladly forego possession for peace, and unchartered freedom for the bondage of love, they will move very free of most that passes to-day for religion, for their worship will be to do God's Will continually, blessing Him in their task that it is His Will, and that they are His children, and finding ever new delight in bringing to a greater degree of perfectness what He gives them to do; sharing with their fellows all that is lent them to share, and finding in direct communion with the Father all-sufficiency for life and death. This is the new awakening, and the religion that is to be.

The Good Promise of Sincerity.

Is there any sign of such to-day to hearten us in the long waiting, to raise hope when otherwise it must sink beneath the appalling pressure of these sad times? Is there anything that is stirring and contending in the inner life of the people and manifesting itself in many directions as the herald of the coming day? Unquestionably there is. Its name is Sincerity.

For when we ask what of distinction and originality has found expression amongst us of late, what of real individuality there has been which the esteem of future generations will not willingly let die, we are bound to admit—eagerly or tardily, that whatever has been masterly and consummate within the last fifty years of our national life has been the direct outcome of Sincerity. Take, for example, the scientific progress that is one of the most significant notes of our time. What is it has opened the gates of the Past and admitted man to his heritage? Sincerity. To read the lives of Darwin and Huxley is to realise, as by no other means save one, what absolute Sincerity is. It was because of their unclouded Sincerity that these pioneers of thought were able to interpret nature, being led on step by step in patient, disinterested inquiry, willing to affirm only what they believed to be true, until a new learning burst on an astonished world.

Not in Science only, but in Poetry and Art.

Thus Sincerity lit our realm; but truth is such that if men will be true at all, she claims them altogether. Therefore it is not surprising to find, when we reflect, that Sincerity is the master-thought, the very spirit and essence of what is great in our poetry. "Truth is the strong thing. Let man's life be true," is not merely a quotation from Browning: it is the motive of all those great singers in all their song and their life which was their noblest song, of Browning himself, of Tennyson, of Matthew Arnold, and Clough and William Morris. Nor is it strange, therefore, that what is distinctive and original in our Art should be the fruit of Sincerity, that side by side with the Seers and the Sages one should arise whose avowed mission it was to tell the world of Art that the main spring of its energy was sincerity, and the burden of its utterance truth, who judged—and raised unutterably—the Art of his time by announcing its aim to be the selection of the largest possible amount of truth in the most perfect possible harmony. To read the works of John Ruskin and the lives of those who exemplified his teaching is to see how really is sincerity of disposition and life the hand and eye of the artist.

William Morris: New Hope for Workers.

But there is another realm which has yielded richly in what is distinctive and original, and will stand out to the eye of the future as a joy for ever. And I speak of this the more gladly because there is hope here for the common toil and life of the people. I refer to the arts and crafts of everyday life, the ennoblement of which is associated with the name of William Morris. Morris, the simplest of men, the type in every way of eternal childhood, the man untouched by division of motive, by the fruitless longing for incompatible opposites which is such a prominent symptom of our present diseased life. In him and what he stood for we find a new world of joyous labour opening before the common eye, a world wherein all can excel, and each be happy in the realisation of his powers. And this world, too, turns wholly upon the poles of sincerity.

For Morris told us—and his message finds increasing echo—that the secret of art is in the lives of the workers; that it does not and cannot exist for itself any more than religion—it exists as a quality of something else, of work faithfully and individually performed. And if you have come into close contact with those who share and are striving to fulfil this ideal, you will know, as I by no array of words can tell you, what a divinely beautiful thing our modern life would be were Sincerity thus the aim and spirit of labour; and you will believe with me that men and women who find their religion in working truly with their hands, and whose minds are at peace in the contemplation of noble things, are the chief agents at work for the coming of the Kingdom of God.

Let Unitarians care more for these things.

And here will you bear with me when I say that I should like to see Unitarianism—so splendid in its intellectual seriousness and moral integrity—concerning itself more intimately with truth in the common life. Unitarianism has planted its standard on the hill-top where hover the august things of life and death. That is great. It is great to have proclaimed the message that a religion without Sincerity cannot be a religion at all. But there are the valleys—the homesteads, the fields, the workshops, that require that standard, that message. We must concern ourselves with the raising of manual labour from the ignominy into which it has fallen, with the spread of joyous and intelligent craftsmanship, with freeing our own lives from all that is conventional, pompous, luxurious. We must remember that there can be no real religion until the mass of the toilers are able to toil honestly and well; and that until those of us who live a little above the stern necessities of toil, who rank as "consumers," realise our responsibility to the "producers," and further the demand for work that is educative, there is little or no chance of the realisation of the Divine in the common life. And another thing, I believe that if Unitarianism shows itself in downright earnest that the people shall live, much of that apathy that is at present manifested towards the intellectual ideal of Unitarians will disappear, and the people will realise how religious emancipation turns a stream of fresh and good aspiration upon the whole of life.

Sincerity alone can prevail, and Give Joy to Common Life.

I repeat, then, that if there has been of late years anything really great in our national life it has been the direct outcome of sincerity, and this I take to be an indication whence the awakening is to be expected. Consider what our modern life might be were it inspired with the motive that those whom I have mentioned have manifested. Why should it not be so? Why should we choose to walk blindfold when there is such a wealth of light and beauty and joy awaiting us at every point? Let us for ever cast away those wrappings, the conventionalities, the frauds, the insincerities of our religious and social life, so that the light and beauty and joy may flow in uninterruptedly. Let it be the religion of each of us to unify life by the spirit of Sincerity, and so assist in setting free by the might of truth and love the divine possibilities of the common life.

We have always trusted that a better To-morrow was coming to meet us; and in the highest sense, we have never been disappointed. If thus far it has been so, why will it not be forever so? We have never found the end of anything; why then shall we find the end of life? We have always been delivered by one thing to another; why then will not death simply deliver us to something higher?—Reed Stuart.

Dr. Horton's new apology for the Trinity differs but little in substance from previous presentations of the same case; eloquent, lucid, devout, sincere, his pages do not impress the reader by any startling originality of reasoning. When we find him opening his volume with the statement that "the distinctions of Father, Son, and Spirit are established in the usage of the New Testament," we recognise an old acquaintance, and quietly substitute "terms" for "distinctions," seeing that the New Testament writers certainly do not use these terms to distinguish three Persons within the Godhead. When we read that "one is bound to see in the Unity of God more than one, a subject and an object, and a unity of subject and object," &c., the mind reverts to Professor Knight's precisely similar pleadings in "Inter Amicos." Dr. Horton's very silences have the quality of expectedness. He is a little more emphatic than other advocates of Trinitarianism, as when he tells us that "philosophy is bound to conceive God essentially in this way," and that "the fact of the Trinity may be said to be the Gospel"; but this vivacity of manner apart, the matter of his arguments is familiar. They have been answered before; they will be used again.

It is when he enters upon a polemic against Unitarianism that Dr. Horton becomes, to us, interesting. The crude methods of former times—threats of certain eternal perdition awaiting the unbeliever—are clearly out of date; and Dr. Horton, being a man of his age, represents belief in the Trinity not so much as indispensable for future salvation, but rather as the necessary condition of spiritual health in this life. His formula concerning the Trinity would be, "which except a man believe, he must be without hope and without God in the world"—i.e., without that knowledge of God which Christianity alone reveals.

"Unitarianism," says Dr. Horton, who, by the way, revives the practice of classing Unitarians as non-Christians, "surrenders the revelation of God in Christianity to fall back upon the revelation of God in Judaism." The validity of such a statement must, of course, depend upon what we hold to constitute "the revelation of God in Christianity." We think that most readers of the New Testament will be unprepared for Dr. Horton's extraordinary declaration that this revelation, made by Christ, consisted in "the manifestation of the relationships existing in God," of which for our own part we find nothing in the teaching of Jesus. If "the manifestation of the relationships existing in God"—i.e., Trinitarianism, was the real message of Jesus, it has been delivered in a form strangely difficult to decipher; if this is the revelation of God in Christianity, then Unitarianism not only surrenders but has never received it. We will take it, however, that Dr. Horton is much too clear-headed a thinker not to know that first of all to define the Christian revelation in such a way as necessarily to exclude Unitarianism, and then to point to Unitarianism as surrendering the Christian revelation, is an ingenious rather than a legitimate dialectical process; we will further take it that, when not engaged in demonstrating Trinitarianism, Dr. Horton knows that the revelation of God in Christianity is Christ's "manifestation of the relationship existing" between God and man—the relation of a Father to His children. To ignore, even temporarily, the central feature of the teaching of the Gospel is surely a curious intellectual feat for a Christian theologian! To ignore that this is what distinguishes the typically Christian from the typically Jewish conception of God—that the whole message of Jesus is summed up in that one word of inexhaustible richness of meaning, the Divine Fatherhood—is to achieve the almost incredible.

But if the revelation of God in Christianity be the revelation of God as Father, Dr. Horton's charge falls, of course, to the ground. No community has more emphatically, more passionately, affirmed the good Fatherhood of God than ours; and it remains distinctly to be regretted that Dr. Horton should have allowed himself to make a serious charge in terms which are bound to lead to misunderstanding and to arouse resentment. What he means when he accuses Unitarians of surrendering the revelation of God in Christianity is in the last resort no more than that they do not believe in the Trinity; what he will be understood to mean is that Unitarians have not that intimate sense of God as their Father which the world owes to Christ. The latter statement, if made, would, of course, be, not a perversion, but the direct inversion, of the truth; it would be more correct to say that popular orthodoxy, with its doctrine of a wrathful God who could not be reconciled to mankind except by the intercession and sanguinary sacrifice of Christ, had all but surrendered the Divine Fatherhood, which it remained for Unitarianism to rediscover.

With a curious disregard for the testimony of Jesus, who never hinted at such a doctrine, Dr. Horton seems, however, finally to have convinced himself that the thought of God as a Living Father cannot enter the heart of any except Trinitarians. Non-Trinitarian monotheism, he says, "recognises a transcendent God; away on the horizon, or beyond it, He wields His august sceptre, to be reverenced and feared, but hardly to be approached." Dr. Horton is strangely misinformed about his Unitarian neighbours: we do not care, either as individuals or as a denomination, to be baring our religious experiences, and least of all for purposes of controversy; but whether we worship God as One "to be reverenced and feared, but hardly to be approached," or rather as our Father, Friend, and Comforter, let our hymnals and liturgies, the whole tone and temper of the published utterances of our spiritual leaders attest.

But the fact is that by staking so much upon the indispensableness of Trinitarian dogma, Dr. Horton damages his own case. He tells us in effect that belief in the Trinity alone can give us a soul-satisfying sense of God—that apart from that belief the spiritual life languishes and deteriorates. When, in answer, we point to a Channing, a Hamilton Thom, a Martineau, a William Rathbone, and many an humble saint who walked close to God in the same Unitarian faith, is it not clear that not only is Unitarianism vindicated from Dr. Horton's aspersions, but Trinitarianism is correspondingly compromised? If belief in the Trinity is not essential after all, on the score of its helpfulness, will many people earnestly cling to it on the score of its reasonableness? Dr. Horton appears to think so; we can but register the contrary opinion.

Of Dr. Horton's treatment of the person of Christ, it would have been tempting to speak had space permitted. We confess to genuine disappointment in finding a teacher of such wide influence giving his adherence to the doctrine that without Christ there can be neither knowledge of God as love, nor any salvation for man. To speak of Christ as "the solitary proof of the vast truth that God is Love" argues either a state of self-induced blindness or a truly appalling scepticism. To say that "apart from Christ it is open to any man to maintain that God is an unknown force, inexorable, indifferent to human suffering, regardless of human life," is to disregard deliberately a vast volume of spiritual experience. Not in such ways is Jesus honoured. We recognise that in and through him we have received such an attestation of the love and Fatherly care of God as is unique in degree; we reject utterly the suggestion that apart from him God hath always and everywhere left Himself without a witness. Among the cloud of such witnesses Jesus ranks incomparably first; his assurance of the Father's love persuades and comforts us when our own hearts would grow faint and doubts would bow us down. But these benefits we receive, not as Trinitarians, from God the Son, but as Unitarians from the Son of God: he hath shown us the Father, and it sufficeth us. J. WARSCHAUER.

THE ROBINSON MEMORIAL CHURCH, AT GAINSBOROUGH.

SIR,—The members of historical societies in Massachusetts connected with the settlement of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, are looking with perplexed interest on the tercentenary of what is called the Robinson Memorial Church, at Gainsborough. They profess to be diligent students of local history, and especially of anything relating to the origin and migrations of the Pilgrim Fathers; but so far, have failed to find any evidence whatever that John Robinson was ever settled over a church at Gainsborough, or that any of the Pilgrims were connected with the Separatist movement to which John Smyth ministered. Can you enlighten them on the subject? Why is the church at Gainsborough called the Robinson Church? The Pilgrim movement took its rise at Scrooby, and we have always been led to understand, that it was with that movement, and no other, that John Robinson threw in his lot. The Scrooby Church, according to Bradford's history, began in 1606, and Richard Clyfton was its first minister. After the flight to Holland, John Robinson was chosen and ordained to succeed Clyfton. This was in 1609, and appears to have been the beginning of his official connection with the Pilgrim Society. If the English Congregationalists have any historical evidence of his connection with the Gainsborough Church, or anything more than mere conjecture that he was ever in Gainsborough at all, we shall be glad to be put in possession of it, that we may correct our historical data.

Incidentally, I notice too, in the Boston Herald of the 18th inst., that a delegation from our American Congregationalists is to be present at the Gainsborough celebration, and that among these representatives is the Rev. D. M. James, who is said to be the minister of the Church of the Pilgrims in Plymouth, the church of the Forefathers. The only church in Plymouth with any direct historical association with the Pilgrims is the First Church in Plymouth, to which it is my privilege to minister. Its records go back to 1606. The present edifice, a fine memorial church erected by public subscription a few years ago, and enriched by stained glass windows and tablets illustrative of its history, is the fifth building in which the Society has worshipped. It has also maintained a continuous ministry since its foundation, and no other church has any valid claim to its heritage. The church over which Mr. James ministers is the seventh child of the First Church, and began its career in 1801 as the Third Church of Christ in Plymouth. In 1870 its minister at the time was possessed with the idea that since it had seceded from the First Church it had as good a title to the Pilgrim heritage as the parent church. He proceeded to make this claim apparent by having the name of the church changed to "The Church of the Pilgrimage." But, still, the old church held the records, funds and an unbroken line of ministers and deacons, and was indisputably the First Church. In order to surmount this difficulty he prepared a Church Manual in which he appropriated all the ministers and deacons of the First Church down to 1801, to which he added from that date onwards the names of his own predecessors, and called his church the first and oldest church in America! This unscrupulously funny way of making history probably accounts for the statement that the delegate to the Gainsborough Centenary, from Plymouth, represents the New England Forefathers!

At present I think it may be safely alleged that our local historians, without exception, are curious to know more about Robinson's connection with the Gainsborough Society. They will be grateful to any of your readers who can furnish them with additional information. They find it hard to work up any sentiment on the subject in the absence of historical facts, and regard the memorial to John Robinson in Gainsborough in much the same light as the proposed memorial to the Pilgrim Fathers in Plymouth, which Mr. James's congregation is trying to raise next door to the old First Church, solely on the ground of fancied theological sympathy. In both cases, the sentiment is admirable but invalid, unless it can be satisfactorily proved that John Robinson had something to do with the Gainsborough Church, and the legal and moral right of the First Church in Plymouth can be in any way contested, which is impossible.

JOHN CUCKSON.

Plymouth, Mass., May, 1902.

In reply to Mr. Cuckson's question we may say that, so far as we are aware, there is no evidence that John Robinson of the "Pilgrim" Church was in any way connected with the Separatist Church gathered by John Smyth at Gainsborough, and the connection of his name with a modern Congregational church at Gainsborough would appear to be simply a matter of sentiment.

In his "Haunts and Homes of the Pilgrim Fathers" (R.T.S., 1899), Dr. Alexander Mackennal has a chapter on Gainsborough, which tells of the memorial stone in the Congregational church, "In memory of John Robinson, Pastor and Exile," laid by the American Ambassador, the Hon. T. F. Bayard, June 29, 1896; and speaking of Robinson, Dr. Mackennal says:—

> We should like to be sure that he has been identified with John Robinson, Fellow of Christ College, Cambridge, in 1598; for then we should think it highly probable that he was a native of Gainsborough. Bradford leaves it uncertain if he was a member of the Separatist Church in that town, constituted in 1602. What is known is that he went to Holland as a member of the Scrooby Church, and that that community was connected with the church in Gainsborough. Probably the Scrooby Separatists were at first one fellowship with those of Gainsborough, coming weekly along the road of fourteen miles which still exists, and crossing the Trent by ferry. We know this, and it is enough. The spiritual succession, so much more significant than the biographic details, is established; and it is well done to have gratefully associated a church in Gainsborough, of the order of government he loved, with John Robinson's name.

In an earlier book: "The Story of the English Separatists" (Congregational Union, 1893), Dr. Mackennal wrote:—

> The history of the Gainsborough Church is enveloped in obscurity. It was gathered by John Smyth, who was a resident of the town, and was constituted a church under his leadership in 1602. From the Gainsborough Church proceeded the church at Scrooby, formed in 1606, which went to Leyden in 1609; and from which again, in 1620, went out the Mayflower company, who founded the colony of New Plymouth, and were the authors of American Congregationalism. We have contemporary authority for these statements in the journal of Bradford, the second governor of the colony, who was himself a member of the Scrooby Church.

The date 1602 for the formation of the Gainsborough Church appears to be a mistake. Mr. Arber in his "Story of the Pilgrim Fathers" (1897) adduces evidence that Smyth was still a clergyman at Lincoln in 1605, and only in 1606 separated from the church and established his new society at Gainsborough, and he adds:—"We are not aware of any evidence tending to prove in the slightest degree that Robinson was ever a member of Smyth's Church." And a few pages further on he says:—"This Lincolnshire movement is entirely distinct from the one we are now considering; though, of course, the one helped the other" (p. 54).

That Robinson was a native of Gainsborough is only a conjecture. Lamb's revised edition of Masters' History of the College of Corpus Christi, Cambridge (1831), gives: "1598. Robinson, John, M.A., Nottinghamshire. He resigned his fellowship 1604." Neither is it certain that this is the Robinson of the Pilgrim Church. That the Scrooby Church "proceeded" from Smyth's Church at Gainsborough would also appear to be only conjecture, rendered highly improbable by Mr. Arber's correction of the dates.

THE UNWHOLESOME DWELLINGS AND SURROUNDINGS OF THE PEOPLE.

THE Housing problem is of such pressing importance that it is being taken in hand seriously in many places; but far more must be done than is yet in progress if things are to be prevented from getting worse: and to make them considerably better will require larger schemes and many more of them than are at present in operation. The question is not merely that of the provision of a sufficient number of houses with adequate rooms for decent and healthy living, distant as we are at present from that consummation. Even if houses are built to satisfy the ordinary sanitary requirements, they may be too many on the ground; the whole district in which they are placed may be unhealthy, too closely built upon, deficient in vegetation and fresh air, poisoned by factory smoke, or otherwise calculated to impair the vitality of the residents and promote disease. Pollution of rivers, the public sanitary arrangements, the cost of land, the intelligence and moral character of the people, and other considerations form part of the problem of overcrowding and consequent deterioration of physique of English town-dwellers.

The solution of the problem will be complex as the problem is complex, but it must be attempted; and certainly the evils can be to a large degree overcome if there are enough men and women of wisdom and enterprise, not utterly bound down by a narrow view of their own interests to the sacrifice of the best of their own possibilities together with the well-being of their neighbours.

In various parts of the country housing committees or associations of citizens have come into existence whose object is to improve the conditions of life in the towns where they are formed, and have shown the vigorous activity of people who are in earnest. In Manchester an association of the kind came into existence whose spontaneous origin, apart from any political or other party, is interesting. A newspaper correspondence on the lodging-houses and slum-dwellings of the city led some who had written and read the letters to the idea that there might be advantage in a meeting of those who had shown interest in the subject. A further letter to the newspapers invited attendance and named the place and time.

When a number of men and women met together in a dingy schoolroom not far from Albert-square, it was manifest that the assembly was not in the interests of any particular party or scheme. It resulted in a resolution to call together another conference to which representatives from local organisations, voluntary and publicly elected bodies, should be invited. The most manifest practical purpose was to make known to the people dwelling in unsanitary houses and amid objectionable surroundings the means by which their condition could be improved and their wrongs set right by the application of existing laws. It was felt that the people often suffered from evils which might be alleviated, in ignorance that there were officials whose duty it was to attend to them, and that there was a remedy that could be applied. This was a reason for seeking the co-operation of public as well as voluntary bodies.

At the larger conference held at the Y.M.C.A. hall a good number of people assembled, and appointed an executive "with power to add to their number." This power has been used, and has resulted in the addition of men and women representing important agencies and who have special knowledge or interest in the work, so that now it may be considered as a committee of experts.

Mr. T. C. Horsfall attended the meeting at which this executive was appointed, and was appointed President. He offered to guarantee a sufficient amount of money to secure for the committee the possibility of making careful inquiries into the existing conditions of Manchester life, with a view to the issue of a report on the subject, together with recommendations as to the remedies. This branch of the committee's work, made possible by Mr. Horsfall's generosity, and assisted by contributions of money and of valuable voluntary help, has been diligently pursued under the direction of the committee and their secretary, Mr. T. R. Marr, in whose engagement for the work they were particularly fortunate, as he has specially devoted his energies and studies to the understanding of the practical conditions of the problems the committee wishes to meet, and is a capable leader.

While this work has been continued, several matters of immediate utility have forced themselves on the attention of the committee. Some workmen's houses erected in the past by the Corporation were reported to be in a bad condition through faulty structure. Investigations were made by the committee and by others, and the attention of the authorities drawn to the matter, resulting in the censure and dismissal of the responsible men. There is small consolation in this unless it deter others from similar negligence. But far more pleasant was the relation of the committee to the Blackley Housing Scheme of the Manchester Corporation: in friendly conference with the Housing Committee of the City Council, a great improvement has been brought about in the plans and accommodation of the dwellings with attention to the possibilities of ventilation, sunny aspect, and provision of baths. In these and other ways the committee has been led to take action in relation to passing events while collecting information for its report.

At a recent meeting of the committee, together with those of its supporters who were able to be present, it was decided to transform it into a Permanent Citizens' Association for the Improvement of the Insanitary Dwellings and Surroundings of the People. It was felt that the publication of the report on the conditions of Manchester life in the autumn by no means exhausted the useful activity of such a committee, but during its deliberations it had become manifest that for purposes of immediate practical action it is imperatively needed. It is satisfactory to record that the co-operation of the committee has been heartily welcomed by the City authorities, and in the future such mutual assistance in work for the public good is most desirable. The report to be issued when the investigations have been completed and considered, cannot fail to be of great importance as a basis for further action such as is the first and most pressing requirement from a city's council.

The Association for the Improvement of the Dwellings and Surroundings of the People is steadfastly opposed to the decision of elections of members of the city council, or municipal officers, on the lines of party politics or issues of national policy. The attitude of the candidate towards questions of sanitation, health, housing, open-spaces, water supply and the general well-being of the people of the city which they wish to govern, is the important consideration, and on such issues there will be an effort made to influence the elections. The non-partisan action of the executive committee has been manifest not only in its relation to such practical work as it has taken in hand, but also in its own constitution and deliberations. The choice of members has been made to include those who were most likely to contribute knowledge and ideas of value. Jew, Catholic, Church of England, Nonconformists of various sects, sit round the table; Professors of Owens College, City Councillors, members of the University Settlement, several ladies with special qualifications, and other people who have knowledge and service to contribute. There has not been the shadow of a party or sectarian difference, or of working for ulterior ends. The intention is to do away with some of the worst evils of overcrowding, and point the way and lead the way to more wholesome life, with a knowledge of the facts, and a desire to make use of all existing legal provisions for improvement, and a clear perception, founded on investigations, of what further measures are required.

In the interests of all sections of the community, from the wealthy landowner or man of commerce to the day-labourer and slum-dweller, great and general change in the condition of town-dwellers is necessary. A great empire cannot be built up of sickly, under-fed, stunted, overcrowded men and women, nor of the pampered and luxurious.

PRIESTLEY PRIME.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION IN THE SENIOR CLASSES.*

BY THE REV. GEORGE CRITCHLEY, B.A.

IN the first place, I venture to say that no such education should be attempted in classes at all. The time is past, or nearly so, when it can be done with usefulness and effect.

My experience of Sunday-schools has been gained in another denomination, and entirely in London, but I believe two things are generally admitted facts:—(1) That in proportion to the population there is a wide-spread decline in the attendance at Sunday-schools; and (2) that the decline is chiefly due to the fact that the young people drop out of the schools at an earlier age than they did twenty or thirty years ago.

Many causes have been working to produce this result; but I am firmly convinced that one of them is the persistence of this antiquated class system for the elder children of Sunday-schools.

Weakness of the Class System.

I am well aware that it will be said: "What then—would you destroy the beautiful relations existing between the teacher and the taught? Would you forget the life-long friendships which have been established, and the beneficial influence arising from the close personal connection resulting from meeting in the class?" And I answer: "Yes, I most certainly would, if by so doing I could secure a better adaptation of the work to the conditions and feeling of the time—and could thereby secure the greater amount of good."

Besides, I respectfully submit that there is less fact than fancy in the assertion that all these benefits accrue from the present system—less sense than sentiment in the belief.

No doubt there are these ideal teachers and ideal children somewhere in the world—I may have met one or two of them myself, but they are not nearly so numerous as appears to be supposed, and in any case are the reverse of the majority, while upon the other hand the instances of unsuitability are many; and when young people whose emotional capacities and intellectual faculties are just in the opening stage find themselves tied down to meet in a small class the same persons week after week, then, unless the bonds of sympathy be very strong indeed, the result is weariness, and there is no wonder that, as other interests begin to gather into life, the young people should begin to drop away.

For the fact is this, that the men and women really qualified to deal with children of, say, thirteen years old and upwards in any given school are, and must be few; and you are, therefore, wasting the power, which is always all too little, when you confine them to a class, and, moreover, place them and their children under the additional disadvantage of rules and methods which must always be strongly suggestive of the restrictions and discipline of the ordinary school.

A Better Method.

Hence, I venture to submit that in the religious education of the elder children everything reminiscent of the day-school including the very word "class," should be laid aside as far as possible. I would gather the young people into larger groups, I would call them clubs, guilds, meetings for the study of religion, or any other suitable name that might suggest itself. I would have them meet in a separate room, and give them a separate constitution from that of the junior school, and, above all, I would have them led by the most capable person that could possibly be found connected with that particular community.

Fortunate is the denomination which could count in every church one person fitted for the task.

One point which should recommend this plan to consideration with many churches is the economy of strength—for a much smaller staff would be required—while the larger size of the meeting would be an abiding inspiration to all concerned.

Is it too bold to cherish the belief that somewhere in this direction may be found a link of the chain which shall hold some of these young people during those critical and later years when so many of them are lost to both church and school, so that we may not have to win them quite all afresh for religion when manhood and womanhood have come?

The Teacher must Lead and Educate.

But organisation is, after all, only the beginning of the work, and the success of any such movement as that which has been indicated will depend very largely upon the leader of the meeting, especially in this respect, that he must recognise the broad distinction between religious instruction and religious education.

It is the vice of scholastic methods generally that instruction and education are confounded with each other, or, rather, that instruction is too often substituted for education, with the result that there is a large amount of information given with very little power of putting it to profitable use.

Items of knowledge are sedulously piled on to the mind, while too little care is given to the far more difficult task of leading out the child's faculties and making them ready, flexible and strong, with the view to handling the knowledge to good purpose in the actual experience of life.

The results are not greatly satisfactory in the matter of general education, for all ranks are clogged and cumbered by innumerable persons, highly instructed, and highly incapable at the same time. They are not taught to use their faculties, except that one of memory, the most mechanical of them all.

Religious Education.

But if the distinction is important in the preparation of young people for the business of the world, it is, I submit, vastly more so in the matter of religion.

For here the great purpose is emphatically education, to qualify them for the use of the moral understanding, to develop the spiritual sensibility, to discipline and invigorate the will, to vitalise the higher nature, and generally to lead out the germinal possibilities of moral and spiritual faculty into freedom, wholesomeness, and strength.

Hence the wise leader will throw a great deal of the actual working of his group or guild upon the young people themselves—for he has to remember that he is not a professor delivering lectures or a preacher delivering sermons, or even a teacher giving a lesson, but a leader guiding these young people first into a realisation of themselves as rational, moral, and spiritual beings, and then to an application of their faculties to the higher purposes of life.

Wherefore, it is of the last importance to him, indeed it is absolutely essential to his purpose that he should discover their intellectual and moral whereabouts, the sort of level on which they stand, the difficulties which they experience, the things they half see—or see wrongly—or ought to see, but do not see at all.

Philip was right, in that old story of the Acts of the Apostles, for, pace questions of authenticity and all the rest, he acted on the very soundest principle of religious education when, in dealing with the eunuch, "he began at the same scripture," which was then livingly present to the man's mind and heart.

Encourage the Young People to Self-Expression.

For the purpose here in view we must find people and take people "where they are," and hence the wise leader will get these senior children to express themselves by whatever means may be within his power; inviting and inspiring the freest utterance, the fullest self-revelation, that can be obtained.

There is the place at which instruction will come in with effectiveness and point. It may take the form of explanation, illustration, story, parable, historical or biographical example, or what not, so that it is calculated to guide and stimulate the thoughts and feelings which have been brought to expression on the subject in the direction of goodness and truth.

Be absolutely Sincere.

And here, in connection with those deeper matters which must ever remain half and more than half in shadow for us all, I would ask for the uttermost of intellectual sincerity—even the courage to say "We do not know," for it is better to leave things so, than to give the cheap and easy answer which will silence the young questioner for the moment, or present an apparent solution of a difficulty, but whose futility will presently be discovered, with this dire consequence, that confidence in the leader will be seriously imperilled, if not entirely lost. I call that a dire consequence, because that loss of confidence very easily passes by the teacher to work havoc upon the thing itself.

Finally, it may be said, "But these are ideal children, the real ones manifest no signs of the possibilities of which you speak. They are indifferent, careless, insensible." Still, I assert, the faculty is there. Let us rouse it, quicken it, call it out to its beautiful activity. For we, at least, do not believe that torpor is proof of the absence of spiritual life and faculty; it is only this: "The child is not awake," "We go to awake him out of sleep."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare: Highland-place (Appointment). Mr. H. Fisher Short, of the Home Missionary College, Manchester, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of this church, and will enter on his duties on the second Sunday in July next.

Boston. — The bazaar to raise funds for the renovation of Spain-lane Chapel was held on Thursday and Friday, June 5 and 6. It was opened on Thursday by Mrs. Frank Harrison, a local lady, who takes an active part in temperance and other good causes. Although a Congregationalist, she expressed her good wishes for the success of the cause, and her sorrow that the chapel had ever been closed. The chairman was Mr. C. Wright, of Vauxhall House, one of the trustees. On the second day the President of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association, Mr. J. Harrop White, of Mansfield, was the opener, and gave a most inspiriting address, with assurances of the sympathy of the churches of the district. The chairman was Councillor H. Barron Clark, a member of the congregation. The bazaar realised over £40, which, with donations, brings up the fund to £150, but £100 more are needed for immediate requirement.

Irish Nonsubscribing Association.—A Sunday-school Conference was held at Dunmurry, on June 7, under the presidency of Mr. Thomas Andrews, D.L., President of the Association, and there was a large attendance, which included Mr. A. H. Biggs, representing the London Sunday School Association. After an opening hymn and the chairman's address, a paper was read by Miss Patterson on "The Use of Models in Sunday-school Teaching," and discussion followed; a welcome being also accorded to Mr. Biggs, on the motion of the Rev. A. Ashworth, seconded by the Rev. J. A. Kelly. Mr. Biggs, in responding, accentuated the ideas put forward in Miss Patterson's paper. Young people were full of animal spirits and wonder, and it was wise to awaken their curiosity and interest if they were going to instruct them. They had had one new idea presented to them that day, and he believed if some such plans as those set forth in Miss Patterson's paper were practised the young people would have a livelier interest in the school. He referred to the publications of the London Sunday School Association, and especially advised the use of "The Sunday-school Helper." A second paper was afterwards read by the Rev. A. Davison on "The Need of Definite Doctrinal Teaching in our Sunday-schools." This was also followed by a discussion, and after a concluding hymn the Rev. W. H. Drummond pronounced the Benediction. Among the speakers, besides the above-named, were the Revs. J. Hall, T. Dunkerley, W. J. Davies, J. Jellie, R. Lyttle, Miss Malcolm, Mr. Bailie, and Mrs. Riddel. A cordial vote of thanks to Miss Patterson and Mr. Davison was passed on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Mellone. Tea was hospitably provided by Dunmurry friends, and the company was so large that it was served out of doors. Votes of thanks to the hosts of the evening and to the President brought the proceedings to a close.

Kendal.—On Sunday evening, June 8, the Rev. Herbert V. Mills had been announced to preach on "How the Civilisation of South Africa began; or the Life of David Livingstone." He spoke to a good congregation at considerable length of Livingstone's training for his life's work in the "School of Adversity," of his arrival at the Cape in 1842, and subsequent studies of African dialects, geology, botany, and zoology, and of his long and lonely journeys through the dark Continent during the following twenty-nine years. He spoke of Livingstone as one whose love for the human race was unsullied by any taint of personal ambition, or love of ease, or love of Mammon. It was his one purpose in life to win Africa for civilisation and Christianity. Then speaking, in conclusion, of the recent war and its termination, he said: "To-day, when we rejoice that peace is declared in South Africa, our thoughts go back to Livingstone. We compare our modern standards of righteousness and of human service with those which animated thy life, and we acknowledge thy purity of soul: we know that thou hadst indeed 'overcome the world,' and went therefore fit to civilise others and able to save souls. If in these latter days we have fallen away from that conception of duty, and service of mankind, which was thine, O let the time to come, these golden days of peace, be worthy of thee—thou pioneer, thou lover of Africa, thou conqueror of hearts, thou friend of man."

Lampeter.—The eleventh annual musical festival of the Unitarian Churches in Cardiganshire was held at Lampeter on June 4. The spacious Congregational Chapel was kindly lent, as on former occasions. It has a seating capacity for 700, and in the afternoon service it was so crowded that benches had to be brought into the aisles. Contingents came from each of the thirteen churches, that from Llandyssul, the extreme southern end of the district, travelling thirty miles in brakes, the train service not being convenient. It was estimated that there was a muster of 600 voices, and the scene both at the morning and afternoon meetings was something to remember. The conductor for the second year was the Rev. E. Gwilym Evans, B.A., of Chesterfield, who, on the previous Sunday, went through a hard day's work in conducting two rehearsals at Capel-y-Groes and Llwynrhydowen, and in testing and correcting the work of the different choirs which had been engaged for many months with the programme. Owing to a combination of circumstances, special attention was given to the festival proparations this year, with the result that the eleventh meeting has turned out to be one of the most successful in the series—by far the most successful in point of numbers, and in the zeal and enthusiasm shown by all concerned. The presidents for the day were Rev. R, C. Jones, Lampeter, in the morning, and the Rev. T. A. Thomas, Llandyssul, in the afternoon, in the unavoidable absence of the lady president appointed—Mrs. Jones, Gellifaharen. Short addresses, at intervals of rest, were delivered by the presidents, and the Revs. J. Davies, Alltyplacca, W. James, Llandyssul, and L. Williams, Rhydygwin. The collections made during the day secured a larger total than ever before. The festival has undoubtedly found a permanent place in the loyalty and affections of our people, and its remarkable success is a tribute to the vitality of Unitarianism in Cardiganshire. The continuous training for so many years has also brought our church music to a higher pitch of excellence, and one often hears it said, whatever may be thought of Unitarians, there is one thing they can do almost better than any other body in Cardiganshire—they can sing. The Rev. W. C. Bowie, in his recent visit, saw abundant evidences of vitality in our churches, but he missed the opportunity of witnessing what 600 voices inspired by Celtic fervour, can make out of the so-called dry bones of Unitarianism.

Liverpool: North-End Domestic Mission.—The prizes for regular attendance at the Sunday-school were distributed on Sunday afternoon, when books, to the number of twenty-three, were awarded to as many scholars, three of whom had made a perfect attendance during the year. Mr. W. G. Topping gave an address on "Wishing and Striving." At the evening service Mr. Topping preached on "Words and Deeds," taking as his text Deut. v. 28 and 29 verses, and made reference to the conclusion of the war in South Africa. During the service the duet, "O Lovely Peace," and the anthem, "How beautiful upon the Mountains," were sung. The congregation was the largest—with one exception—that has assembled at Bond-street for several months.

London: Rhyl-street.—In answer to my appeal for a piano, I have much pleasure in stating that one has been kindly sent to the Mission by Mr. Samuel Charlesworth, of Upper Clapton, for which I thank him very heartily.—William Wilson.

Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches.—The offer of a visit by the Governing Body of the Association having been accepted by the Queen's-road Church, Urmston, a service and meeting were arranged for Saturday last. The service began at four o'clock, the devotions being conducted by the Rev. W. .L Schroeder, of Sale, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Thomas Robinson, of Hale. The text was from Acts xxiv. and Revelation xiv.: "After the way they call heresy, so worship I the God of our fathers . . . having an eternal gospel to proclaim unto them that dwell on earth." The service was fairly well attended, and the numbers were considerably increased at the evening meeting. The Rev. Charles Roper, President of the Association, took the chair, and was supported by Mr. H. Woodhead (Upper Brook-street), Mr. W. Canning (Urmston), the Rev. H. Kelsey White (minister of Urmston), Mr. G. W. Henshall (Urmston), and the Rev. J. Arthur Pearson (Secretary of the Association). The proceedings were altogether bright and cheery: a spirit of confidence and hope moved in the hearts of all present, and the speaking was helpful. Addresses were delivered on "Church Work," "The Personal Idea in Relation to Individual and Congregational Life," "Sincerity in the Religious Life," and "Association." This was the first invitation in response to the Governing Body's expressed desire to be of greater use to the churches, and its success supplies good grounds for believing that the Association has found a right way of helping forward the work so many have at heart, but about which they venture to say so little.

Manchester: Strangeways.—Unitarian services promoted by a joint committee representing the congregation at Strangeways and the Manchester District Association, were inaugurated on Sunday evening June 8, in the Broughton School, Bury New-road, Higher Broughton. There was an encouraging congregation, including a number of strangers, and the singing and preaching were inspiring and hearty. The Rev. W. R. Shanks, who is leading the movement, preached on "Our Religious Ideal: Worship in Spirit and Truth."

Stourbridge.—The annual choir sermons were preached on Sunday, June 1, by the Rev. George St. Clair. In the morning the discourse was on "Music in Public Worship," and in the evening on "The depth of meaning in Hallelujah." Special anthems were rendered by the choir. The collections reached £5 0s. 9d., and were expended the following day on the annual choir excursion to Stratford-on-Avon.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AMONG the students successful in the Natural Science Tripos at Cambridge last week was Mr. C. H. B. Epps, of Christ's, who got a first class in Part I. Mr. Epps is a son of Mr. Hahnemann Epps, whose name is well known, not only by London Unitarians, but far beyond the metropolis.

LAST Saturday a memorial was unveiled in Brinton Park, Kidderminster, to Mr. Richard Eve, late of Aldershot. Mr. Eve, who was an earnest Unitarian, and frequently to be seen at the meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, was a native of Kidderminster, and a warm supporter of the Unitarian cause in that town. He was also warmly attached to the Freemason movement, and gave specially valuable service as Chairman of the Masonic Boys' Schools. When it is added that he was a keen and intelligent politician, held in high honour by his party, it will be seen that he fully deserved this tribute to his memory.

CLAUSE I. of the Education Bill has been passed in the Committee of the House of Commons, but only after the closure was employed. It will be a very serious matter if the Government mean to pursue the course of forcing the Bill through in the way it has begun. Opinion against the Bill appears to be strengthening almost from day to day. Mr. Balfour's courteous but unconciliatory speech in reply to Dr. Fairbairn's protest last week as head of a Nonconformist deputation, has called forth severe criticism, not only from the Opposition. A great meeting was held on Tuesday at the Metropolitan Tabernacle in opposition to the Bill. A speaker roused the greatest enthusiasm by challenging the Government to appeal to the constituencies on the lines of the measure.

THE "Coronation Odes," elicited by the Good Words Prize Competition, were finally judged by the Rev. Stopford Brooke, Mr. Edmund Gosse, and William Canton. The judges were assisted by committees of critics, who made the preliminary sifting required in dealing with over a thousand poems. Three ministers are among the first four writers in order of merit, their only competitor (sharing third place) being a lady. The magazine publishes, in addition to the prize poems, a selection from the rest, at the head of them we are interested to see an ode by Miss Laura G. Ackroyd, specimens of whose verse and prose have been contributed to THE INQUIRER and The Helper, and who has achieved some success with several volumes of poetry.

SEVERAL esteemed correspondents have sent us letters commenting more or less adversely on the "Address to the Boers," which, as we stated last week, is being signed on the invitation of the Rev. J. Page Hopps. With entire respect, we cannot open our pages to a discussion of that "Address" or of the wisdom of issuing it. It is a matter to which we alluded purely as news, and without offering any opinion on it. One opinion we all share at this time—namely, that the surrender of the Boer troops has been attended with such symptoms of good feeling on both sides that it would be the best of blessings if the present fraternal temper could be maintained and intensified. How to secure that end must be left to each to decide for himself.

THE Bishop of London announced on Monday at the annual dinner in connection with King's College, that on the previous Friday the Council of the College had passed the following resolution :—

That in view of the situation created by the University of London Act, 1898, the Council, while determining to maintain the connection of the College with the Church of England as set forth in Section 5 of King's College, London, Act, 1882, resolves that, so soon as may be, every religious test as qualification for office, position, or membership, in or under the Council or College, other than professorships or lectureships in the Faculty of Theology, shall cease to exist, and further, that all necessary and proper steps be taken to give effect to this resolution.

The voting was 22 to 2, and to give the minority its due, it must be recorded that Dr. Wace, formerly Principal, has resigned his seat on the Council as a protest against this surrender to the principle of unsectarianism. The Bishop's announcement cannot but be satisfactory to ourselves and all who believe that the truth is able to live without artificial defences such as tests. Some, indeed, declare that the new departure is due to the impossibility of affiliating the College to the University of London without the abandonment of tests. Whatever the reason, we will rejoice that the gospel of free teaching and free learning is being preached even in the citadels of sectarianism. By-and-by, the theologians may be emancipated like their brethren in other Faculties.

A REVIEW of Mr. Seebohm Rowntree's "Poverty, a Study of Town Life," by the Rev. J. W. Chadwick in a recent number of the Christian Register, quoted some of the results embodied in the careful work as to the condition of the people of York, and concluded with the following passage :—

In 1887 I spent a day in York, which was one of the most memorable days of a journey that abounded in delightful experiences, transfigured long since into pleasant memories. The sun never shone brighter, the sky was never bluer, or the air more sweet and pure. The grounds of an old monastery had been converted into a playground in which the well-to-do had special rights. They were there in good numbers, a happy joyous throng. In and out of the beautiful ruins wandered the loving pairs; and here and there groups of children made a picture, perching gaily upon fragments of arch or cornice jutting from the thick green sod. That lovely scene made York for my imagination and my memory. How could I know how little representative it was—that beneath that surface show of happiness was the festering mass of twenty thousand people living in abject poverty? And now, as I have read Mr. Rowntree's book, that day of ignorant happiness has seemed to me typical of England's surface show of wonderful prosperity with the submerged quarter banked down beneath it; possibly, like the volcano's long-delaying doom. Hardly less typical it seems of our own prosperous condition with its solemn and portentous undertone of social misery. Battening upon the infinite resources of our virgin soil, it may be some time yet before we reproduce the conditions of the mother country; but we are working toward them with an irresistible momentum, and the increase of urban population is one of the signs that marks the tendency. The wonder is that, with such infinite resources, the "abyss" is already inclusive of so many souls. We are living too much in a fool's paradise, vaunting the splendour of our industrial successes and blind to their appalling incidents of social misery and defect.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

IT seems scarcely possible to say anything about the Education Bill without repeating what has already been said; but even that may meet the eye of someone for the first time; and however that may be, it is, perhaps, not useless for people to be again and again reminded, in a case like this, of some elementary truths, and to keep the fire of opposition burning by reiterated appeals to their love of justice and religious liberty.

The first obvious truism is that this Bill is not an education bill; its proposals will not serve the cause of education in any way. It is admitted that one object of the Bill, is to give relief to certain voluntary schools, which, as Mr. Balfour said to the agriculturists, are in considerable difficulties. By voluntary schools is meant denominational schools, and by denominational schools, we must understand the schools belonging to the Church of England. Incidentally, some other schools, chiefly denominational, may in a measure be relieved if the Bill passes, but this is not from any desire to help them but because it cannot well be avoided.

It is admitted that one object of the Bill is to assist Church of England schools; it would be more correct to say that this is the one object. If these schools are in difficulties, and no doubt many of them are, and if they must still be maintained, then surely some method of assistance might have been devised which would not have aroused so much justifiable opposition, and which would not so insolently disregard the rights and feelings of half the nation; but, as it is, in order to attain a certain end, it is proposed to overthrow the School Board system, which has, on the whole, worked so admirably for almost a generation; to remove many of the safeguards intended to secure educational efficiency; and to place large sums of money, drawn from the ratepayers, in the hands of school managers who are to be free from popular control. Taking it altogether it is almost impossible to imagine how a worse scheme could have been devised.

Naturally the proposal to further endow the Established Church in the name of education has aroused the indignation of the Nonconformists; their protests have been pardonably loud, even if, as some may think, their threats are a little unwise; but much may be excused people in their righteous anger. Nonconformist demonstrations against the Bill have been many and impressive, but what we may call the official demonstration was the deputation which waited upon Mr. Balfour on Thursday, the 13th inst. The leading ministers and laymen of the Evangelical Free Churches composed the deputation, whose sentiments were voiced by Dr. Fairbairn in an address which might be described as at once moderate and strong. Dr. Fairbairn pointed out that the deputation represented these Churches as united in opposition to the Bill, "in a degree and with a determination without any parallel in their separate or collected histories."

Mr. Balfour seems curiously ignorant even of the nature of the system he defends; he courteously told the deputation that if the Nonconformists had any grievances, the Bill would lessen them. They complained, for instance, that their opportunities of entering the teaching profession were immensely limited by their exclusion from half the schools in the land. Mr. Balfour replied that this might be so in some cases, but he thought that the grievance had been exaggerated. He surely ought to be aware that most, if not all, of the trust deeds of Church schools expressly declare that the teachers must be members of the Church of England. Again, it was said that Nonconformists were excluded from taking part in the management of the schools which their children were forced to attend. Mr. Balfour asserted that this injustice would also be diminished by the Bill. How far from true this is we shall see when we refer, as we shall do in a moment, to the provision for the appointment of the managers. Mr. Balfour's attempt to minimise the Nonconformists' grievances was a total failure. All this is familiar ground; but in Mr. Balfour's reply to the representatives of the Agricultural Interest who addressed him on the following day, we find matters even more instructive. The Agricultural Interest, more than any other, always wishes to be let off cheaply. The deputation assured Mr. Balfour that they were already heavily overburdened by local taxation, and they urged that the charges likely to be involved under the Bill should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer. It might be fairly argued that the whole cost of education should be so borne, as even Mr. Balfour seemed inclined to admit; but he gave his case for the Bill entirely away in the next sentence, when he said, "So long as administration was left to local bodies those bodies must bear financial responsibility." One is disposed to exclaim—"A Daniel come to judgment!" For what is the obvious application? So long as local bodies bear the financial responsibility they are entitled to the administration. That is the first point, and, perhaps, the last, which we maintain in opposition to the Bill. It was a welcome admission. The Times newspaper the next day stated the principle with even more emphasis:—"There is much to be said for this contention (that the cost of education ought to fall upon the Treasury), but those who urge it hardly seem to keep sufficiently in view the principle that those 'who pay the piper have the right to call the tune'"—which is exactly what the Nonconformist ratepayer says.

We must content ourselves at present with one other point in this address, which leads us to the root objection—the constitution of the proposed new authority. Mr. Balfour spoke of these authorities as "elected bodies." Now all we demand is that they should be elected, and elected in the only sense worth anything—that is, by a direct vote. First of all, it is proposed that the authority shall be the County or Borough Council; then we are told that except for the purpose of raising a rate, &c., the Council shall act only through an Education Committee, a majority of which shall be selected and appointed by the Council; but selection and appointment by the Council are not election by the people; but a portion of the committee is also to be appointed by the Council on the nomination of other bodies, or persons, so that the elective character of the authority, if there is any, is to be further diluted by this nomination ab extra, and yet Mr. Balfour called these committees, selected and appointed by the Council or other bodies or persons, "elected bodies." The choice of the electors is altogether ignored. The management of the denominational schools is to be left to the same class of managers as at present, with the proviso that the Committee shall have the right of appointing such persons as they think fit to be additional managers so long as the number does not exceed one-third of the whole, "As they think fit!" But what can they do in the case of those schools whose trusts forbid the appointment of any person as manager except a member of the Church of England? They must select such a person, and not any whom they think fit, and yet Mr. Balfour asked the Nonconformist deputation if that would not be an immense improvement. No wonder that the deputation failed to see it.

WARNING.—The Revs. J. A. Pearson and C. H. Wellbeloved write, independently, to warn readers against a woman—middle-aged, well-dressed, Scottish accent—going the rounds professing to be in sudden distress, in search of a son or daughter, or with some other plausible story, and quoting the names of ministers in other towns. Her aliases are numerous; her aim is one. There is one protective remedy—namely, not to give, however plausible the story, till it has been tested.

WHEN Emerson, Martineau, and everybody else began proclaiming the Real Presence of God, what we are fond of calling the Immanent Presence of God, when men found that they were really fellow-workers together with Him, or, better, that He was a fellow-worker with them here, the confidence of men with an omnipotent law asserted itself. "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work," became from that moment the watchword not of the well-beloved son alone, but of all God's sons and all God's daughters.—Edward Everett Hale.

TYPES OF RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

IV.—FROM CALVINIST TO UNITARIAN.

BY THE REV. ALEXANDER WEBSTER.*

THE Presbyterianism which girded my childhood was of the severest Calvinistic sort. It had a superficial correspondence with the primitive conditions of a northern region—with the whinstone, the peats, and the rushlight. It fitted the overawed and uncritical intellect, superstitious regarding Nature, and the insularity into which the larger humanity had not penetrated. It sanctified severity, enhallowed morbidness, and glorified grimness. The northern experience of natural forces was rigorous, and bred in the mind a dourness which tinctured its philosophy. In country places society was scant, and men were thrown in upon themselves for company. Being individualism in dogmatic form, Calvinism suited the solitary, stolid, and sombre existence of the people. It nurtured a self-contained egotism, made the individual soul morbidly anxious for its own safety, and so raised a race of grave and siccar men. The conditions into which Calvinism fell as a seedling in Scotland generally were those of dread stubbornness, born of isolation and ignorance. It was absorbed by the native mind in one of its morosest moods, and has remained with it as an early impression, but with fading tints.

Francis Grierson describes the Celtic temperament as a "dazzling paradox and bewitching anomaly." How such a temperament "characterised by imagination, sentiment, and an indefinable sense of poetic mystery" should have lodged a theology so hard and ruthless as that of Calvin is a psychological puzzle. But the true explanation seems to lie in the fact that Calvinism in Scotland grew as an encrustation which "suppressed imagination and hardened the heart," and so spread with an influence which vitiated rather than vivified.

An Instinctive Revolt.

In thinking back, I find that my severance from ancestral tradition and training occurred, first of all, by a revolt which was temperamental. There arose in my boyish mind (how, I know not) an instinctive repugnance to the rigour of the religion and morality in which I was trained. My spirit protested against the suppression and deflection of emotion to which it was subjected. The dominant dogmatism wrought distortingly while it operated repressingly. Early I experienced a heart rebellion which sought a free exercise of emotion for the sake of healthy affectional growth.

I suppose there is not a Scotch boy, trained in Calvinism in the old way, but has experienced this revolt of temperament. George Macdonald has elaborated the experience in "Robert Falconer." Two generations ago the restrictions which were so galling and spiritually hurtful to Robert were common, and tended to make boyhood a stunted, colourless, tuneless, and withered thing. It was good for boys like him that Nature was stronger than the Catechism. The continuous charm of natural movements acted as a corrective of the stern metaphysic which was the regularly dispensed spiritual food for babes, and saved the soul from utter starvation and distortion.

The Boy's First Lessons.

My earliest memories are scholastic and doctrinal. I was brought up by an aunt who kept a school, and I learned in the room by day and slept in it by night. I was her companion to the weekly prayer meeting, held in an elder's house some distance from ours. She was lame, and took me as a physical support in walking. Those who attended the meetings were all seceders of the blunt Presbyterian type—members of the Original Secession Church, to which my father's family belonged. They usually discussed some of the darker dogmas, and very gruesome their talk was to me as I sat on a low stool watching the peat's glow while the speakers, with their faces in shadow, gravely stated their opinions.

At eight years of age I was familiar with Calvinistic phraseology, and felt it to be a very portentous thing. I caught a glimmer of the significance of the stern faith, and felt the weight of the anxiety of its believers. There were no liberties in that sphere. The fear of God made restriction ruthless. Even play was solemnised. The shadow of the sombre elders lay always upon the path of the bairns. To speak in their presence, except in douce reply, was forbidden. To laugh was a profanity. The Sabbath was a day of close restraint. To go out of doors, except to church, was not permitted, and to look out at a window even at the sky was an impiety. Every child of seven could read the Bible, and a chapter of it had to be read aloud as a Sabbath evening duty; also some portion of the Shorter Catechism and of the Metrical Psalms or the Paraphrases had to be repeated before the early retiral to bed was allowed. Before I was ten, I had all the primary standard by heart, and, though I understood little of it, I felt a pride in being able to repeat it. A good memory for Bible words and Catechism phrases was regarded as a mark of piety, and I was reckoned as having the mark deep. My aunt, who had the theologic mind, took care that I did not lack the things of conventional piety.

From Village to the Town.

At ten, I changed my residence and teachers. From a small, unprogressive Aberdeenshire village I went to a busy Lanarkshire town. The change was fateful. Though my home surroundings were still Calvinistic, and in some respects stricter than before, everything else was different. Whether it was the enlargement of view or the natural working of a latent scepticism, I cannot say, but I had hardly been two years in my new sphere ere I began to question what I had been taught. My drilling in Calvinistic dogmatics was continued. I was sent to a minister's class, and had to learn the Larger Catechism. My mind strongly revolted against the elaborated doctrines, and so passed into the second revoltant stage on the ground of reason. Two companions joined me in an endeavour to resolve the doubts shared by us. While others were concerned with the Evangelic side of theology and were anxious about their personal salvation, we were constrained intellectually, and sought for the rationalism of faith. We were not troubled about what was commonly termed conversion; we troubled for the ark of God. We undertook such investigation as was possible to us. We discussed the whole scheme of theology in the course of long walks, pondered privately and compared thoughts, re-read the Bible, and at length, after a period of intense anxiety, confessed to each other, with a terror and yet a relief upon us, that we could not believe the main doctrines of Calvinism.

A Battle in the Dark.

We were specially averse to "Predestination" and "Reprobation." There was an autocraticness and malign cruelty in these dogmas which we could not bear for God's sake. I had then the agonising experience of the way in which the dread of the Almighty, inwrought into the mind by Calvinism, prevented religious worship. I felt that the fear of God destroyed trust and love. The vision of reprobation and endless torment silenced prayer to God. I could not revere the Being who first created and then cursed human beings. I tried to find a refuge for reverence in Jesus Christ. But I could not adjust the second person of the Trinity with the first, or find any security for the prevailingness of his intercession. I found afterwards that what had occurred in my own mind was exactly what had resulted in Calvinistic practice. God was practically separated by Christ. The compassion of Jesus was used to cover the wrath of God. Prayer was made to Jesus, hymns were sung to him, worship was given to him. God was virtually obliterated, and much theological and religious mischief was done. My companions and I had to keep the dread secret of our disbelief to ourselves, for we knew of no sympathetic soul to whom we could confess. But while this eerie struggle was going on I was preparing, at my new aunt's request, to join the Free Church. At fourteen I was set to special duty for that. This may seem a premature proceeding, but oldness soon overtook children in those days. Entering his teens a boy was required to know his own mind and to be able to say whether he was converted or not. Indeed, when I left home at ten, I got as a gift from an elder of the church a little book entitled "Early Piety," which I was expected to assimilate. I felt the inversiveness of that method, though I could not express the truth in my feeling. I found it profoundly expressed afterwards by Dr. Martineau in these words:—"In your efforts to enlarge the child's belief it is well to proceed outwards rather than inwards; to awaken apprehension of facts more than reflection upon feelings; to glorify for the young disciple's eye the world around him by lifting the veil from what is beautiful in nature and great in history; and not drive devotion back upon self-wonder and self-scrutiny."

The Youthful Heretic.

At fifteen, I was through the "Larger Catechism" and into "The Confession of Faith." The Communicants' class had it for a text book and was closely examined in it. But before I had gone far into it, I rebelled outright, and confessed to my aunt the heresies at which I had privately arrived. She was startled and pained, but I was determined, and left the church of the rigid dogmatist for another in the same denomination which had a minister of a more genial disposition.

* A Paper read at Essex Hall on Thursday, May 22, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

I was still eager for truth. I had a class in the Sunday-school, and was one of a small band of young men and women that met on Sunday mornings for prayer and edification. We read papers on religious subjects and discussed the views stated. All the while, I was groping for something deeper and surer, but had neither guide nor clue. The Calvinistic circle was a very close one. No heretical literature was permitted in it; doubt was a sin, inquiry an impiety, infidelity the deepest iniquity. There was no chink through which light could enter. The mind was hermetically closed in, and its piety lay in submission. My scepticism increased. I had difficulties about the Trinity, the Atonement, the Inspiration of Scripture, but with inborn reserve kept them close. Privately, I pondered over the New Testament, but only to be more puzzled. I found by my own examination the historic and philosophic differences in the Gospels, but was even more dismayed by the differences between them and Paul's letters. I found in "Romans" a phraseology unlike that of the Gospels, which indicated another world of thought. I tried to understand the "unco" terms of Paul—the "tions" as an old woman called them—Adoption, Justification, Redemption, Propitiation, &c. All that I could make out in my solitary groping was that there were no similar terms in the sayings of Jesus. I experienced a revulsion from the Pauline terms, and fell back on the simpler and naturalistic terms of Jesus.

From Calvinism to the Gospels.

I remember my surprise and gladness at finding how few of the proofs given in the Standards were in the words of Jesus. It dawned upon me that Calvinism was from Tarsus rather than from Nazareth. I turned with fresh interest to the Gospels, compared them laboriously, and, while I was dismayed by the divergence of the histories, I was pleased to find that the sayings of Jesus had nothing in them to support the doctrines of the Trinity, the Fall, Original Sin, and Vicarious Atonement, which are fundamental to Calvinism. I noted that the chief term used by Jesus regarding God was "Father." Fifteen times in the Sermon on the Mount alone it is used, but I had never heard it used of God in common language. God was the "Almighty," and the term was pronounced with fearful unction. In all my Calvinistic years I never heard of the Fatherhood of God. No one learning the Catechisms and the Confession could gather from them that God was Father of mankind. It is his Sovereignty that is dwelt upon. Men are his subjects, not his sons. The figures used in theologic speech were forensic, courtly, feudalistic. I did not know then that Calvinism rose in a feudal age and was a theological embodiment of the feudal spirit. I was soul-hungry for terms of affection in theology, but there were none such. The legalistic language had an imposing sound, but it was misleading. I found later that the assumption of the Sovereignty of God is not radical. It indicates an office, not a character. We need primarily to know the spirit of the Infinite. It is not the royalty of Deity that we need to recognise so much as his morality. Religion implies a spiritual relation, and terms of affection fit it best. Not in the Court, but in the home do we find the analogy properly applicable in theology.

I dimly saw all that, while I also apprehended that the dogma of Biblical Infallibility had no real ground, and that the textual method was indefensible. With the detection of the varieties of thought in the New Testament, the authority of Scriptural dogmatism vanished. An appeal from Paul to Jesus was possible, and a choice had to be made between the Christ of Mark and the Logos of John. But I had to feel my way to these things alone. All through my teens I carried my unresolved mental load. Over and over again I turned to the words of Jesus, and, though there was much in them that was dubious, their main emphasis impressed itself on my mind as laid on love of God and love of man.

At Glasgow: New Light.

Removal to Glasgow in my eighteenth year enlarged my sphere of observation and experience once more. I was still an adherent of the Free Church, and had a sectarian prejudice in favour of it. But my sectarianism was blinding. I did not know of the outer world of free religious thought. I had never heard the word Unitarian, and was utterly unaware that there was a religious sphere of the kind represented by the term. I imagined there was some middle ground between Calvinism and Atheism, but where or what it was I did not know. The exclusiveness of Calvinism is a positive concealment. Its glorification of ignorance is a sin against the mind. But I was determined to solve my difficulties, and went to hear what the more popular preachers had to say. From them I turned to the Secularists, but the coarse and flippant negations which were then characteristic of Atheistic speakers were even more distasteful than the dogmatic assumption of Calvinism. Though I sought to know what the Atheist had to say for his attitude, I felt that the actual choice of the truth-seeking soul did not lie between Calvinism and Atheism, but between Calvinism and some form of Theism. All my subsequent thinking has deepened that impression. My Calvinistic training saved me from Atheism by giving me a protective awe of the Infinite.

Dr. Waddell.

The first inkling of the path for which I had been seeking was got from the utterances of a freelance who came to Glasgow to found the "Christian Union for the Church of the Future." He taught me the impotency of dogmatism, and the principle of development in theologic thought. By his help I found the attitude of mind and the method of search required for truth. And by him I was encouraged in the confidence of reason, in critical determination, and gained the power to dismiss whatever insulted my soul. I realised at last the fundamental falsity of the Calvinistic position in the fixing of thought of the Infinite once for all at any particular point. I saw the narrowness, the arbitrariness, and the unscientific character of Calvinian dogmatism. My religious faith was still merely scriptural. I retained the impression of my training that the Bible was the only source of knowledge regarding God and life. But my new teacher was a man who had escaped from Calvinism with imagination unimpaired, and who applied to the Bible a rationalistic fancy which made its narratives mystically naturalistic. For a while I was satisfied with the new life breathed into the old records, but on reflection saw that there were deeper questions relating to the origin and literary worth of the Bible which only a higher criticism could settle.

A Larger View of Revelation.

It was not enough to say:—

> The Lord hath yet more light and truth
> To break forth from his word;

a plea had to be urged for more word. The conviction came to me that even if Calvinism could show that it is entirely Scriptural, it must still be held as placing theology on too narrow a basis. The manifestation of God cannot be comprehended in the history of Israel—not even to Christianity can God's revelation be confined. The literature of religion is more than the Old and New Testaments. There is a "Bible of the race" being slowly writ which should be taken into account. The development of humanity manifests the operation of God. The discoveries of science in the investigation of Nature are acquirements of divine truth. I found this was unacknowledged in Calvinism. Its dogmas were erected ere the Bible was scientifically handled and known. Its primary theological assumption had a political instead of a moral import. As a whole it was premature and grotesque, the product of "that inflexible soul" who "arrogated to himself the divine right to define what was Christian or anti-Christian."

Theodore Parker.

These thoughts were surging in my mind when there came into my hand the first volume of the works of Theodore Parker, published by Barker and Co. in 1863. It was to me what a letter from Emerson was to Carlyle—"a window flung open to the azure." It consummated my conversion. Shortly after I heard a preacher in a Unitarian church for the first time—George Dawson—in the St. Vincent-street Unitarian Church, Glasgow. I had been made ready for them by the anti-dogmatic teaching of Dr. Waddell. By my experience of what was being taught by the popular preachers in Calvinistic churches, I had found that orthodoxy could not hold me. I had tried the greatest divines within my reach, but got no spiritual satisfaction from any, and gave them up in sorrowful despair.

John Caird was then in the heyday of his eloquence, Marcus Dods was endeavouring to pour new wine into the old bottles, Norman Macleod was labouring to purge the Kirk of Judaism, and George Gilfillan was pouring the vials of his indignation on heresy hunters, but I could not find in their atmosphere the comprehensiveness and rationalness which I desired. I felt that there were fetters, compromise, and obscurantism. I could not be satisfied with the negation of Calvinism which came through temperament. I could not find any modification satisfactory. I wanted something radically different, a positive philosophy to take the place of Calvinism rationally. I felt that I should start from another point and proceed to another centre. I had thought it possible to give up such dogmas as reprobation and everlasting punishment, and retain the others, but found that could not be. Though it is whimsical, Calvinism is consistent; consent to its promises implies the logical adoption of its conclusions. Reformed Calvinism, modified Calvinism is an incongruity which cannot stand. All attempts to restate it, patch it, or rehabilitate it must fail. It must be all or none of it. The ultimate choice lies between Calvinism or dogmatism of any form, and rationalism. The reasoning soul cannot halt between two opinions. It must have the liberty which leads to definiteness, the breadth that is solid, the faith of reason, the spirit of truth.

Joseph Cook, speaking of the "Coronal Eye," said "The Scotch have an eye in the dome of their soul, but they have such an immense front window that they are chiefly occupied in gazing out of it. Rarely, except in periods of mighty religious fervour, do they look aloft through the dome." The coronal eye is being opened in Scotland, and the opening betokens a theological revolution. The movement from Calvinism to Unitarianism commends itself to me still as the movement consequent on true polarity of soul. Passing from Calvin to Channing we accomplish the proper antithesis and arrive at the right alternative.

Unitarianism at its Broadest.

It so happened that I alighted on Unitarianism at its broadest part. Bred in the narrowest theology, my mind by natural rebound took readily to the widest. The strong rationalness, the intense spirituality, the sweeping logic, the rhetorical efflorescence of Parker came to me as the pearl of great price for which I had been searching so long. I had prayed for and dreamt of such ideas of the Bible, of Jesus and of God, as he so enthusiastically expressed, and welcomed them as the very bread of life. I passed with Parker in grateful ecstasy into the sphere of rational faith wherein I have found the light of the glorious gospel of God's universal Fatherhood. I have a very tender regard for the faith of my fathers though it is not mine. I did not dishonour my theological nest by leaving it, any more than the birdling does despite to its birthplace by starting to fly from its mother's back.

I recognise that Calvinism suited certain conditions of life, and that it had a passing veracity and a temporary virtue. But the conditions were crude, and the morality and theology were barbaric.

The Dissolution of Calvinism.

The conditions are now dissolved. With the passing of the rushlight there passed the gloom to which Calvinism was congenial. The supersedure of peat by coal involved the exchange of Rationalism for Puritanism. The rise of cities broke the cake of custom which had in it the elements of Calvinistic life. The species of men and women that took to Calvinism are no longer bred. There are influences in every village that make the structure of the mind other than it was. The Scottish schoolboy of to-day is considerably unlike the scholar of sixty years ago. The elements of belief are changed for him because the elements of knowledge are changed. The spread of education, the increase of literature, the development of intercourse, and the shifting of population have acted upon Calvinism as upon all things, and that which survives under the old name is quite unlike its ancestor. The old time polemical preacher is as extinct as the old-fashioned pragmatical layman. The ground and atmosphere of dogmatics have gone. The old belief is impossible now. The Calvinism of the standards has utterly disappeared. It does not exist even on paper. The standards are embarrassing relics. The church does not like to bury them, and yet it has no ark for them. Scottish Presbyterianism has no creed representing its present faith. Perhaps it has no definite faith to creedalise. Its ideas regarding the Bible are in the furnace, and till they are fused it cannot put its faith in Christ into fitting shape. It is living on compromises which are vain. Its divines are divided in opinion, and it lacks the courage to make a clearance of theological rubbish. The inner elements of the Scottish soul, the imaginative, ethical, and spiritual elements are asserting themselves, and throwing off the old austerity. The sermonic literature of the day has little in it of the old pragmatism and morbidness. In the characteristically Scotch works of fiction that deal with the old believing days, the honour is given to those who are broad in thought and tender in affection, while the bigoted and harsh are held up to correction. Though "Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush," for example, has for its characters persons bred in the sphere of Presbyterianism, its atmosphere is as different from that of the Confession of Faith as that of the "Pilgrim's Progress" is from the Prayers of Theodore Parker. The day of Calvinism is past. It suited a superstitious and severe period, a time of autocratic force and national suspicion. The fear of the Infinite which was its essential emotion is passing into joyous awe at the touch of science; and the morbidicity of individuality is being converted into radiant sympathy by the realisation of the unity of humanity.

Fruits of Calvinism in the Scottish Character.

The awe of the Infinite which is the only thing of worth in the legacy of Calvinism will serve religion better when it takes permanent possession of reason, and is nurtured on the enthusiasms of science and the compassions of fraternity. But it will take long to undo the suppression and distortion which Calvinism has occasioned. It is plain enough now to the student of Scottish character that the taciturnity and moroseness inbred into the Scottish soul are Calvinistic products, against the unnaturalness of which the sensuous passions have always rebelled in wild ways. There is a very close and subtle connection discernible between the characteristic vices of Scotchmen and the dominant Calvinism. The illegitimacy and drunkenness which are the disgrace of Scotland are the reactionary issues of passions arbitrarily suppressed and driven into unholiness distractedly.

Taught to believe that their nature is corrupt and wholly averse to good, men have found shelter for evil in their belief.

What Unitarianism may do for Scotland.

As a Scotchman, I should like to see deliverance from that delusion accomplished. The mind of Scotland is realising the need of it. The idea of Unitarianism for Scotland may seem a fanatical one, but I am convinced, by personal experience, that the development of Scottish religious thought and life lies on Unitarian lines. I do most certainly believe that Unitarian principles and methods lead to the conservation of all that is true and good in the Scottish soul, while they save it from the errors and evils of Calvinism. The work of Unitarian pioneers in the land of the thistle is not done. In some respects it is just beginning. There is a fresh opportunity in the renewed and enlarged anxiety which has arisen from the dissatisfaction with Calvinism. There is, indeed, still an ignorance of and a bigoted prejudice against Unitarianism in Scotland. To dispel these we should offer our literature plenteously. In providing it we have to understand the present conditions and state of theological thought and religious life in Scotland. The earnest mind now does not most deeply concern itself with how many persons there are in the Godhead, but with the deeper question, "Does God care?" It does not ask: "Did Jesus walk on the sea and rise from the dead?" but, Did he enunciate any truth that can lift up life?

We have our answer ready, and in expounding the Fatherhood which is the new Continent of Religion and advocating the Fraternity which is the new goal of morality, we will help to furnish the living bread which the new day requires. It may not be that the regenerated theology of Scotland will call itself Unitarian, but that it will be highly rational and intensely spiritual I believe. The thistle is stubborn, but that it will burst into "glossy purples" of fervent and luminous faith, I fondly hope. As has been said, "Nature possesses the secret of turning dreams into realities. A knell has been tolled for the old order of apathy and prejudice"; and (to alter the saying somewhat) the new dispensation will evolve the higher national sympathies, and offer compensation to the suppressed soul of a creed-ridden people.

As the new century comes in, the voice of God, speaking in all the gospels of all His messengers, shows to you of the next half-century distinct duties even more important, where you must work with Him. Do not scatter your fire. Your weapons are not given you that you may shoot partridges for dinner. You are enlisted by the living God, that Satan may be driven from every fastness, and that God may reign above—that His kingdom may come, that is the Saviour's phrase. This means at this moment that the five continents shall bear each other's burdens, and that there shall be but one world. Europe shall take care of Asia; and Asia and Europe and America, all shall take care of Africa and Australia; and Africa and Australia shall take care for all. More simply, open communication between one region and another shall relieve the terrible congestion of to-day. Thus the Church of Christ has no right in this city to put Mr. Wendte and Mr. Waldron and the Little Wanderers' Home to the business of taking care for two thousand people jammed together on an acre of ground; while in the United States there are seven millions of square miles and about seven millions of families, one square mile of God's earth for every family. Siberia must be opened to Europe and Southern Asia, the South American desert, the plains of Idaho and Arizona. Such duties are for all the world.—Edward Everett Hale.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE report of the Rev. C. E. St. John, Secretary of the A.U.A. presented to the annual meeting in Boston, on May 27, contained a full record of the year's vigorous work. The records of the field secretaries as to the work in their respective provinces were of special interest, as will be seen from the following extracts:—

The Rev. F. C. Southworth, secretary of the Western Conference, reports "a tendency of continually increasing significance; namely, the more active participation of Unitarian churches in the work which is being done in common by the churches of our land. Testimony to this effect from all parts of the field is unanimous and positive. This common work is of various kinds, social, charitable, philanthropic, almost any kind of work which is not sectarian. Into this work our churches and ministers are receiving at the present time a hearty welcome. Bigotry is disappearing. Sectarian lines are being obliterated. Opinions which a few years ago were deemed hopelessly heretical are now no longer a bar to active participation in the religious life of our time."

It should be added that this tendency reported by Mr. Southworth is equally manifest in all sections where our churches are at work.

From the Pacific coast, the field secretary, the Rev. George W. Stone, writes:—"There has been a distinct gain in the power and influence of the churches in this department during the past year. The various agencies for the propagation of our faith have been active and encouragingly successful. The increased readiness with which our thought has been received, when presented by word of mouth or in the form of tracts and other publications, has been noticeable. The transition from the old to the new theology seems to be proceeding steadily. This is shown in the weakening of prejudices against us, as well as in the increased interest in the simple truths for which we, as Unitarians, stand. There is one other tendency plainly visible which will be regarded with interest by the members of the Association—namely, the growing interest in religion and ethics and a corresponding decrease of attention to speculative theories and what is sometimes called by the specious name of 'new thought.' Yet in this Western country our mission is to preach righteousness. Controversy is neither desired nor understood. Beyond a clear definition of our theological principles, at the outset, nothing in that direction is required.

Perhaps the most hopeful indication of our increased efficiency as a body conscious of responsibilities in the development of the best things in the world is seen in a decided increase of missionary earnestness on the part of our ministers and churches. Many there are who have not yielded to this spirit. Nevertheless, very many of our ministers, both old and young, are in hearty accord with the feeling of the administrative officers of the Association, which is that our Church cannot reach its highest usefulness save as it presses on more and more with a missionary purpose. The missionary motive is simply human sympathy, and what we are concerned with is to find out the best way whereby the Unitarian Church can put forth its sympathies. We are not actuated by the pride of growth and power; we are simply desirous of ministering to what seem to us the deepest human needs. If we are right in the assumption that man's deepest need is to have a brave, intelligent, and hopeful comprehension of the possibilities of life, such a comprehension as shall incite him to righteous and unselfish living, and at the same time fill his days with a noble satisfaction in the fact that he exists, then our method of sympathetic endeavour is perfectly clear. We are to go forth to all souls whom we can reach, and so deliver by word and action our great Christian convictions that they shall sink into men's minds to bring forth in each and every one this courage and peace which are so much to be desired. This is the missionary aim of the officers of our Association, of all its field secretaries and State secretaries and also a rapidly increasing number of its ministers and other toilers.

The year has brought forth twelve new Unitarian churches, twenty-one fresh preaching stations, twenty-seven additions to our list of ministers, fifteen of whom have been received from various orthodox denominations, and, around and above all these visible things, the halo of a deepened consecration and a more determined earnestness. What returns the future will give to this augmented body known as the Unitarian Church it would be useless to predict. Indeed, there are few of us that care. It is not the future with which we concern ourselves. We are of those that deal with the present. Whatsoever strength we have inherited from our fathers in the faith, whatsoever power we have gained through the varied influences of life, whatsoever capacity we now hold in our churches and in ourselves, we value simply for the sake of the innumerable children of God. These accumulated forces we propose to use for the immediate betterment of the world. What we can do to-day we shall do. In so far as better organisation and increased numbers enable us to do this one day's work more efficiently, we welcome this earned increment; but we care little for it as a basis of self-congratulation. We offer ourselves to God as a part of the working energies of his kingdom. If He will use us for His immediate service, we shall rejoice. If He use us not, we shall believe the fault is in ourselves; and we shall seek so to improve our nature and increase our efficiency that, when another morning dawns, the great King can at last find us serviceable. One world, one day at a time, is our motto; but we have cause for profound gratitude because of the inspiration we have for dealing with this one day from our noble body of theology and our enlightening religious incentives. This knowledge, this light, are in part what we indicate when we use the word 'Unitarian.' But that word would simply proclaim us as dogmatists if we did not by our individual and united missionary labours prove that our inspiration is not given us in vain, and that we do actually day by day walk in the light eternal which truth throws upon our path."

IN truth, the earth grows more beautiful as we grow better and wiser.—William Smith in "Thorndale."

LEARNING TO READ.

SIR,—I am sincerely grateful to you for having drawn your readers' attention to the important question of teaching our children to read, but I must beg of you to allow me to say something in refutation of the young lady who was the only partially adverse speaker at the meeting. She had attended a number of my conferences with teachers elsewhere, and was never weary of reiterating the same criticisms, although she had been repeatedly refuted by me and by several teachers, who knew the system from experience.

With your leave I will deal with some of her objections seriatim. She warmly approves of my classification of words and sequence of lessons, but asserts that the children are taught too large a vocabulary in so short a space of time. I have taken the trouble specially to go through Parts I. and II., each of which contains about 1,000 words, mostly well within the children's knowledge, range of ideas, and experience; such as: bat, cat, &c.; battle, cattle, nettle, &c.; bad, lad,, had, &c; puddle, saddle, fiddle, and so on; also long words, as: midshipman, carpetbag, gardenroller, &c.; all concrete things, with which most children of the age of six or seven are familiar; but there are about two dozen words in Part I. which may be new to some children, and would require explanation—namely: sham, runlet, chaplet, abandon, dabble, confess, agog, jungle, reck, don, doff, capital, dismal, mental, vanish, captor, anther, fetter, witless, welter, excel, vetch, gender, access. Most of these words are intentionally introduced to illustrate a certain feature in English spelling; thus "access" is to show the hard and soft "c" in juxtaposition, and explained in the "Teachers' Companion." Is it an intolerable hardship to explain about 2 per cent. of the words to the children, and thereby enrich their vocabulary, which all earnest teachers so greatly desire? In Part II. the proportion of words hard to understand is still smaller, and indeed, on investigation, we often find that children know a great deal more than we are apt to give them credit for. Only a few days ago I visited a Board-school in the South of London, where my books are used; towards the end of Part II. occurs the word "palsied," and I asked the class what "palsied" meant, and immediately a number of hands were held up, and the answer given was: "palsied means paralyzed."

Her second complaint is that there were too many abstract words. It is astonishing how immature minds allow themselves to be dominated by a mere phrase. "The Concrete before the Abstract" is an admirable maxim, but only in its right place; for example: in arithmetic the teacher places five (say) pebbles and three pebbles before the child, and leads him to discover that together they make eight pebbles, and with two or three more concrete examples the child understands and accepts that $5+3=8$; but the acquisition of ideas and of the words corresponding to them is beyond the control of any human being, because all through life we acquire new conceptions and expressions and mostly so in the impressionable years of early childhood. Revenons à nos moutons. In the books before us, Part I. contains ten or eleven abstract nouns, (i.e. 1 per cent.), namely: sadness, fitness, wisdom, hospitality, worship, abundance, substance, distance, hindrance, penmanship. Most of the children have heard at least some of those words, by listening to the conversation of their elders, and if they have not it is not difficult to explain them. Moreover, many of these abstract nouns are utilised and thus explained in the reading lesson that follows. Thus: "penmanship" comes under the category of words taught on p. 35, and on p. 38 occur the sentences: "Is this a sample of Tom's penmanship? It is; it is not bad penmanship, is it?" The fact is that children use abstract nouns in their daily talk; of course they have but a limited idea of their force, or to use the philosophical jargon, they know a denotation but not the full connotation. "What a pity!" cries little Nell, and "It is a jolly shame," says Tommy. But our rigid theorist insists: Children should not have Abstractions presented to them at all; first comes the thing, than the symbol or the word, and lastly the Generalisation or Abstraction. Admirable! but, unfortunately, in our civilised life notions, conceptions, and ideas crowd in upon the mind helter-skelter, and positively refuse to be marshalled in on the lines so confidently traced by the pedant's ruler. A London child reads over a shop "Agricultural Implements," and has never seen a plough or a ploughed field, yet heedless of all subversion of principles universally recognised the ruthless little iconoclast insists on knowing the meaning of these words.

Her third complaint is that the "Drills" are wearisome. Well, as to that, I can only refer your readers to the experience of those teachers who are using the books; there are about 100 Board Schools and numerous private schools, who have already adopted my system, and not one teacher among them all has raised this complaint. Only last Friday I accompanied a gifted and experienced headmistress of a large Board School on a visit to another Board School where the system is worked with much enthusiasm and success. The teacher, a B.A. of London, was taking his class through one of the lessons in Part II., and when we left the lady told me that the part of the lesson, which delighted her most, was the "Drill." We also visited a class of beginners, and I wrote on the blackboard: hat, fit, man, men, pot, lid, gun; and I called upon the little boys to read these words; it was most gratifying to watch the children's eagerness, and the shaping of their lips as they first read silently: it, fit, and then in triumph raised their hands anxious to read the word aloud. My critic takes no account of the young learner's delight in overcoming difficulties, which is really the best incentive to study. I was teaching a little damsel of six to read; she had only a short lesson, and craved for more, this being refused to her, she took up a book lying near, opened it the wrong way up, and after a while came to me asking: "Is not this word appendix? I: How do you make that out? Child: Well, ix, dix, en, pen, pendix, áppendix. I: Yes, that is right, but we call it appéndix. But what does it mean? Child: I am sure I don't know."

My critic wants the words of the "Drill" to be woven into a tale. I wish her joy to the task of making bricks without straw, or tales with a vocabulary of no more than fifty little words, such as am, no, he, &c., and even if it were possible it would be most undesirable, for if the object of the lesson is to be gained the new words must be introduced in a certain mutually illustrative co-ordination, which in a tale is impossible. When the "Drill" is mastered, there are sentences and short stories given to utilise the new words learnt.

I am afraid I have already exceeded the limits of your space and your patience, and must leave other fallacies unrefuted; but in conclusion I wish to point out the mischief that is wrought by cramming young minds with semi-philosophical formulæ. These they then apply without discrimination or qualification to all subjects to the great hindrance of educational progress.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Eyes and No Eyes.

I HAVE lately been reading some very delightful books; they are not new, but they were new to me, and very likely they will be new to many of you; and if what I say makes you read them for yourselves, I am sure you will enjoy them, and they will help you to understand and take more interest in many of the things referred to in them. They are by Mrs. Brightwen, and are called, "Wild Nature Won by Kindness"; "More about Wild Nature"; and "Inmates of my House and Garden"; and in the introduction to the first book, Mrs. Brightwen tells how much pleasure she derived through many years of variable health, from not only keeping and taming different animals, and making pets of them, but from really studying them; finding out how she could keep them well and happy, so that they should feel her to be a real friend, as she soon grew to feel each of her pets was to her. She says truly that "the beauties of the country might as well have been left uncreated for all the interest that thousands take in them"; and this is very often the case simply because people have not cultivated their powers of observation, so that they have not the least idea how many wonderful and beautiful things there are all round them. Even some of the animals that many people cannot bear to touch, and describe as "horrid," are really quite beautiful, and very interesting, and Mrs. Brightwen says she owes much of her love of animals to a relative, who, while Mrs. Brightwen was a child, took up a frog one day in her hand, and pointed out the beautiful gold circle round its eyes, and its curious webbed feet, and then described its wonderful tongue—"so long and flexible that it folded back in its mouth, and that the frog would sit at the edge of an ant-hill, and, throwing out the tongue with its sticky point, would pick off the ants one by one as they came out." Knowing and observing such facts makes one take a real interest in animals, and see how much there is in them to study and admire. Even animals that we often have in our houses, but should very much like to be without—I mean common cockroaches—are most curious in their habits, and though they are so small, they take a long time to grow up. A cockroach does not come to its full maturity until it is five years old, and during that time it casts its skin every year. It is curious to see it struggling out of the old skin, pushing it with its legs, and gradually getting free from it. I have watched a cockroach going through this annual piece of work; it took about twenty minutes over it, and at last came out in its new dress of a rich cream colour, which a few hours' exposure to the light gradually turned to dark brown.

Mrs. Brightwen mentions one very curious thing about some Roman snails which she had. She says:—"These creatures were kept in a fern-case with glass top and sides, and it was singular to observe the way in which they could suspend themselves from the top of the box. The substance which exists in the caterpillar or the silkworm moth, and which can be drawn out into fine shreds of silk, is very similar to the slime of the snail, only in the latter it is not filiform (like a thread), but exudes as a liquid and then hardens into a thin layer of silk, which is strong enough to support the weight of two of these snails, for seeing them one day thus suspended I put them in the scales, and ascertained that the weight of the two amounted to $2\frac{1}{2}$ ounces. This mucus forms the glistening, shiny track which the snail leaves behind it, enabling it to glide easily and painlessly over rough substances which would otherwise lacerate its soft body." Is not that a fact to make us look at a snail with interest and respect?

Then the chapter on spiders is very interesting, but it is too long to quote here; you must get the books and read them for yourselves.

One chapter tells how we may encourage a habit of observation, so that when we are out, we shall learn to see many things that now we never see at all, though they may be right under our eyes all the time! And when we have learned to see and observe we shall be surprised to find how much more beauty there is in the world than we had any idea of. A daisy is a common enough flower, but did you ever find out what a wonderfully beautiful thing a daisy is? Examine it through a magnifying glass and you will see that all the yellow inside part of it is made up of numbers of minute flowers, each being a complete flower in itself, perfect in form, though so small you can hardly see the separate parts with the naked eye.

Some of you will be going away in the holidays for longer and shorter "outings." Try how many wonderful or beautiful things you can see, that you have not known of before. You will have plenty of opportunity even in one day's excursion into the country, or to the seaside, and if you are making a longer stay, you can do it still more thoroughly. But even if you stay at home, or if you live in a town, you can find a great deal to observe and study, if you train yourself to look for it. You will find a little folding pocket magnifying glass a great help, and you can buy a very good one for about 2s. Only remember, we shall never see the beauties and wonders that are all round us, unless we take the trouble to look for them with our mind as well as our eyes.

Thou who hast given me eyes to see
And love this world so fair,
Give me a heart to find out Thee
And see Thee, everywhere!

A REVISED HYMNAL.

TWELVE years ago we offered a cordial welcome to the "Essex Hall Hymnal," on its publication by the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, as a hymn-book "admirably adapted for congregational use, inexpensive and convenient in form, printed in good clear type, and likely to be acceptable in the Free Churches which the Association specially desires to serve." That the book did prove acceptable may be gathered from the fact that at the present time, according to the "Essex Hall Year Book," it is in use by 103 of the 283 congregations in England on the roll, while 65 use Dr. MARTINEAU'S "Hymns of Praise and Prayer," and 50 his earlier collection, "Hymns for the Christian Church and Home." "The only ground," we said twelve years ago, "on which this collection will bear comparison with Dr. MARTINEAU'S 'Hymns of Praise and Prayer' is that of utility for congregational purposes." Since 1873 when that collection was made, many new hymns had been added to our store, particularly by singers of the Liberal Faith among our brethren in America, and these could ill be spared from our congregational worship, while it was inevitable that the smaller and cheaper book should be in many quarters more acceptable.

Good, however, as the "Essex Hall Hymnal" was for its purpose, and grateful as our churches have reason to be for its production, no one would pretend that it was not capable of very great improvement, for which the experience of twelve years' use might naturally call. The Association has, therefore, now issued a new and revised edition*, which, we have little doubt, will at once be recognised as a Hymnal of real worth, which has made good use of the added experience gained, and of the ampler stores of these recent years. The stereo-plates of the old book, we learn from the preface, are worn out, and no one who compares this new edition with the old will doubt for a moment the wisdom of the decision which determined that an entirely new edition should be produced. Congregations using the original Hymnal will, if they wish it, still be able for a time to replenish their stock, until the old edition is exhausted; but all who can afford it should as soon as possible adopt the new book. If the transition, for reasons of economy, should have to be gradually made, it will be found that there are 364 hymns common to both editions, and there is a special index in the Revised Hymnal, giving the numbers of these hymns in duplicate.

The "Revised Hymnal" contains 534 hymns, as compared with 512 in the first edition. Of these, as we have said, 364 are common to both books. 148 of the old hymns have been omitted and 170 new hymns added. Of the new edition, even more truly than of the first, it may be said that it is "essentially a modern book; and while every new book is a trial to one's affections in the matter of favourite hymns, there are here so many new-comers to be heartily welcomed, bringing songs of a kind which, above all others, we now want to sing, that the gladness far outweighs the regret." Indeed, for the new edition we make bold to say that there will be found very little cause for regret, and that in it the proportion of really good singing hymns will be found unusually large. We note with special pleasure that the Hymnal now for the first time contains four of Miss A. L. WARING'S beautiful hymns. The index of authors gives 229 names, besides a few names of Hymn-books (where the author could not be identified), and anonymous hymns. Only twenty-nine of these authors contribute more than four hymns each :—A. N. BLATCHFORD, S. A. BROOKE, W. J. CHADWICK, J. CONDER, W. COWPER, P. DODDRIDGE, J. ELLERTON, F. W. FABER, W. C. GANNETT, T. H. GILL, H. W. HAWKES, R. HEBER, J. P. HOPPS, F. L. HOSMER, W. W. HOW, S. JOHNSON, S. LONGFELLOW, T. T. LYNCH, J. S. B. MONSELL, J. MONTGOMERY, J. NEALE, J. NEWTON, A. A. PROCTER, W. G. TARRANT, J. TAYLOR, I. WATTS, C. WESLEY, J. WESLEY, and J. G. WHITTIER. The chief of these, with the number of their hymns are, LONGFELLOW, 25; HOSMER, 20; C. WESLEY, 17; MONTGOMERY, 15; WHITTIER, 14; GILL, 10.

The arrangement of the book is also somewhat altered; it opens with hymns of Worship, Aspiration, and Praise, the morning and evening hymns coming later, after the first four hundred, and beginning the section on Times and Seasons. Very appropriately the first hymn of the whole collection is SAMUEL LONGFELLOW'S: "O Life that maketh all things new," with its gladness and faith in the unity of all seekers of the Light :—

One in the freedom of the Truth,
One in the joy of paths untrod,
One in the soul's perennial youth,
One in the larger thought of God

The freer step, the fuller breath,
The wide horizon's grander view,
The sense of life that knows no death,
The Life that maketh all things new.

Those verses may be taken as a fitting motto for the book, which, while it contains hymns representative of various shades of thought in the conception of Christian truth, is full of robust and joyful faith and earnest consecration to the higher life.

One other new feature may be noted, and that is a short section of children's hymns, which we should have been glad to see even larger than it is. The custom is growing in our Churches, of introducing into the morning service a few minutes' talk to the children, with a special hymn for them. In every congregation there ought to be enough children to make this worth while, and to make it a natural and beautiful part of the service. In the faith that this will be increasingly so among us, the "Revised Hymnal" has made provision for some children's hymns. There are, of course, other familiar hymns in the book well adapted for the use of the children and their elders together.

A careful examination of the book will show, we believe, many improvements in the editing, in the matter of text, selection of verses, &c., and in the suggestion of suitable tunes. We desire to commend the Hymnal to the earnest consideration of our Churches, and of all lovers of sacred song.

DR. FAIRBAIRN ON CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY.*

I DO not propose to enter upon an analysis of this elaborate book. Those who have found in Dr. Fairbairn's previous theological writings guidance and illumination—and they are many—will certainly not fail to find them here; indeed he seems to me to have a steadier focus and a firmer stroke than heretofore. But I am not among those whom he greatly helps; and this book makes it clear that my failure to find help arises from a fundamental divergence ab initio.

The occasion of the present work is the intellectual quickening that came to Dr. Fairbairn when he stood face to face with the religious life of India. It caused him to realise as he had never realised before, that Christianity must claim no exceptional consideration, but must justify its unique pre-eminence among the religions of the world by the facts of its own life and history. Dr. Fairbairn holds that "a system whose crown and centre is the Divine Man is one which does justice to everything positive in humanity by penetrating it everywhere with Deity. The Incarnation," as he reads it, "is the very truth which turns nature and man, history and religion into the luminous dwelling-place of God." Dr. Fairbairn recognises not only man's quest of God, but God's quest of man, in other members of the cycle of historical religions. But the culmination, the solution, is for him in Christianity alone—not the Christianity of the Gospels undeveloped, but the Christianity, the theology and Christology, of Nicæa and Chalcedon also.

* "The Philosophy of the Christian Religion." By A. M. Fairbairn, D.D., LL.D. London: Hodder and Stoughton. 1902. 12s.

Now the mental process, the initial argument on which the whole of this learned and laborious treatise rests, is profoundly interesting, and marks in the most striking manner the intellectual gulf that lies between that Christian Theism which is more and more asserting itself in the circles of progressive liberalism and all "orthodox" interpretations of the person of Christ and the facts of Christian history.

On his very earliest pages Principal Fairbairn states the argument of the Christian theist with extraordinary candour and, as it seems to me, a force and persuasiveness which no subsequent pleadings of his are able to break. The Christian theist sees an absolute irreconcilability between Jesus of Nazareth as he lives and breathes on the pages of the synoptics and the God-man of the ecclesiastical confessions, nay, he sees an insoluble contradiction in the very conception of the God-man as the Creeds present it. And this colossal difficulty at the very entrance-gate of orthodox Christianity, Dr. Fairbairn enunciates with absolute fidelity.

> The doctrine that affirms that Jesus was "God manifest in the flesh," or, in other words, that in Christ the natures of God and man were so united as to form a single and indivisible person, is the very apotheosis of the inconceivable. . . . God and man are too incompatible in their attributes to be conceived as co-ordinated in a being who appears on the stage of history as a human individual, and who has the experiences and suffers the fate proper to one, &c.

The statement is clear and absolute; and it must be repeated that the whole of the succeeding volume does not suffice to break its force.

But Dr. Fairbairn sees in the history of mankind facts which seem to him to compel him to find a reconciliation between the Jesus of the primitive oral tradition and the "very God of very God" of the Creed, and a solution of the seeming contradiction involved in the very conception of a being who is at once God and man. For in the first place he holds that the mere personal charm and winning grace of the man Jesus could never have held the generations of the foremost peoples in the world down nineteen centuries, but must have faded out, been forgotten, and gone under, had it not been protected and preserved by the hard intellectual conceptions of the symbols and confessions; and in the second place he holds that the conception of the Incarnation of God in Christ as set forth by Church authority has had a beneficent action on the world so manifest and so vast that it is impossible to set it down as other than the very truth of God; since no vain imagination, no lie contrary to fact, could ever have exerted an influence so transcendent in quality and in degree.

These two positions—the inadequacy of the person of the man Jesus to have held and shaped the thought and faith of the world as Christianity has actually held and shaped them, apart from encasement in the Creeds, and the incomparable effective power for good of the Christological conceptions set forth by the Church, are the two foundation-stones of Dr. Fairbairn's orthodoxy. However deftly the superincumbent structure be built, if these are taken away, the whole collapses. The crucial question then is this: are these two foundation-stones so well-laid and so solid as to support the edifice which the Principal of Mansfield erects upon them?

Now it may, I think, be admitted that the charm and fascination, the winning power over mind and heart, of the historic Jesus might have been dissipated in the ages of uncritical and unscientific thought had they not been girt about with Church decrees. But that can hardly be adduced as an argument for the truth of those decrees in themselves. Spiritual truth has again and again been preserved in the history of the world by admixture with error. Only is it not the error that touches the hearts and quickens the souls of men, but the truth about which the error is bound. Earthen vessels may carry Divine fruit—that they do so safely down the centuries proves that they are useful vessels, but not that they themselves are fruit. It may be that the symbols preserved the spiritual faith; but it was the life-giving quality of the faith that made men attribute sacred power to the symbols.

But the main premiss on which Dr. Fairbairn lays the stress is what he deems the vast and manifest beneficent action on the world of the conception of the incarnation of God in Christ, set forth by Church authority. In great historic evolutions, in which a myriad causes intertwine, a myriad effects result, it is always perilous work to assume one cause as the master cause of a particular effect. And it seems doubtful whether the contention of the learned author can be maintained. How can he say how much of the effect he admires is the outcome of the creed, and how much springs direct from the personality and the teaching of Jesus throbbing through the creedal form? What is his canon of discrimination? And if I say that the beneficent power of historical Christianity has had its spring in the grace of the human Jesus and the communion of the soul with the Heavenly Father in which he led the way, how can Dr. Fairbairn say me nay?

But one may well go a step further, and say that Dr. Fairbairn's reading of Christian history in its actual course is partial and one-sided. The effect of the actual institutions of Christianity has not been all to the good. Great and terrible evils have sprung directly from the Church—bigotries, persecutions, pride, hypocrisy, cruelty, the suppression of progressive thought, the oppression of the weak. To exhibit these things as the sole result of ecclesiastical institutions would be even more one-sided than to exhibit those institutions as producing nothing but good. But these evils are among the products of organised and ecclesiastical Christianity. And to this day a temper of arrogance and uncharity unspeakably remote from the temper of the Jesus of the Gospels is a common product of orthodox churchmanship; yes, and often a cringing to established powers, a subservience to the order of the world, which fils men who take their Christianity direct from the Gospels with sadness and disgust. One does not like saying these things. One would fain pass them over. But they are simple truth. There are thousands of honest men who see in secular morality a purer strain than in ecclesiastical ethics; and if the Creeds are to be supported on the strength of their marvellous working for good on the history of civilisation, one is forced to point out that there is something in the Churches—and who can say that it is not these very Creeds—which has worked for terrible and enduring evil.

It does not seem then that the argument of Dr. Fairbairn is wholly satisfactory. You cannot safely argue the truth of the Apostles' Creed or the Nicene, or the Athanasian from the beneficent working of the Church upon the world; and there is much to be said by those who attribute to the Creeds not a little mischief-making, and to the pure spirit and teaching of Jesus, which worked as leaven in the world before the Creeds, and will do so after them, the ethical and spiritual enrichment of mankind which is the best fruit of Christianity.

But if the basal argument of Dr. Fairbairn challenges dissent, it is a pleasure to bear witness to the amplitude of his learning and the broad spirit of charity which illuminates all his pages.

THE FOURTH GOSPEL.*

We must congratulate Mr. Lummis on his translation of this important and very interesting book. It is a first-rate piece of work. There is a literary quality about it. We forget altogether that we are reading a translation. The words fit the thought and call no attention to themselves. That is the art of the translator, to efface himself and enable his readers not only to understand but enjoy the book translated without any thought of him.

Turning now to the book itself, we feel how impossible it is even to begin to do justice to it in a short review. The question how far John's Gospel may be regarded as a true history of Jesus is the most interesting and important of all New Testament problems.

Dr. Wendt treats that question with an impartiality and fulness which leave nothing to be desired. We may or may not agree with him, but as we read we feel we are in the hands of a master who faces the problem without prejudice and without fear. No one who wishes to understand the present position of the best scholars towards the authenticity of John's Gospel can afford to ignore this book.

A short summary of some of Dr. Wendt's opinions without argument can alone be attempted here. He begins by comparing the historical accounts of the Fourth Gospel with the first three, and finds that on two points the Fourth Gospel is probably right. It is probable that Jesus paid several visits to Jerusalem during his ministry as John records, and not merely one just before his death as the synoptics state. Further, it is more likely that Jesus was crucified on the day "in the evening of which the Jews ate the Passover," than on the day after the Passover meal. "This is a case where the record in the Fourth Gospel may claim the greater internal probability." On other points, however, Dr. Wendt decidedly rejects the accuracy of the Fourth Gospel. This is especially the case in connection with the Messiahship of Jesus, where it "becomes clear that the Johannine narrative stands in contradiction to the older element." John the Baptist is made to recognise Jesus as Messiah, and point him out as such to his disciples. Further, Jesus himself is described as making known his Messiahship from the first. From Nathaniel he receives an acknowledgment of it, and he makes it known to the Samaritan woman and the man blind from his birth. This is entirely at variance with the older traditions, according to which Jesus first avows himself to be Messiah on the way to Cæsarea Philippi towards the end of his ministry. It is later tradition alone which regards Jesus as appearing openly as Messiah from the beginning, and regarded by John the Baptist and his disciples in that light. Early tradition, as we find it in the other Gospels, is quite incompatible with such a view.

Another important point is that in John's Gospel the miracles are treated as signs or credentials of Jesus's Messiahship. He is made to work them, not mainly to do good, but to prove himself divine. In the miracle of the feeding the five thousand, as told in John's Gospel, "there is no mention of any real need among the crowd that was fed." "This intention of Jesus to accredit himself by a public display of miraculous power comes out most clearly in the raising of Lazarus. "He deliberately defers the journey to Bethany in order to give a grand proof of his miraculous power," and his manner of performing it becomes a demonstration before the many Jews assembled at the grave. All this is utterly out of harmony with the older synoptic record.

In that older record he performs miracles, indeed, but he does them not as signs of his personal glory, but because he longs to help the sick and suffering. It was a labour of love, which he conceals as far as possible from others. "It is impossible to combine these two demeanours without depriving Jesus of all claim to fixed principle." One account must be correct, the other incorrect, and Dr. Wendt pronounces unhesitatingly in favour of the older synoptic tradition. "The outcome of our inquiry so far," he says, "is that in several important connections the historical narrative of the Fourth Gospel bears the stamp of the secondary tradition, and cannot be taken as true and credible. This fact, however, is decisive against the authorship of the Gospel by the Apostle John" (italics ours).

This view is confirmed by the fact that the writer of John's Gospel evidently knew and used our three synoptic Gospels. If he was the Apostle John, an acquaintance and intimate friend, it is inconceivable that he should have borrowed, over and over again, phrases and arrangements from writers who did not know Jesus as well as he. "Writing in the light of his own recollection and the impression formed on himself, he must have preserved some originality of detail. The fourth evangelist is dependent, even in minute details, on the earlier narratives." This Dr. Wendt proves by a careful comparison of many words and phrases. He sums up by saying that the whole nature of his employment of the synoptic literature is symptomatic of the secondary character of his history." So far, Dr. Wendt's criticism may be called negative or destructive. The Gospel was not written by the Apostle John, and the historical framework is untrustworthy.

Now he proceeds to argue that "the great discourses and other utterances of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel are largely authentic." He quotes with approval the words of Holtzmann, that certain elements in John's Gospel "look like reminiscences without regard to dogma," and refers to Harnack's opinion that "in some way or other John the son of Zebedee stands behind" it, though it was written by John the Presbyter. Dr. Wendt believes that the writer of the Fourth Gospel in "his composition of the great discourses made use of an older written source — Memoirs of the Apostle John." Indications of this source group themselves into two great classes:—1. "There are certain strange differences between the attitude of the evangelist and the thoughts in the discourses of Jesus which he records, differences such as would be inconceivable if the evangelist had been the independent author of these discourses. 2. There is, in many cases, a curious discrepancy between the discourses and their narrative framework." The rest of the book is concerned with showing his reasons for belief in this written source and with considering its value. To this long and detailed argument it would be impossible to do justice here. He argues that "signs" in the historical framework are regarded as essential proofs of the Messiahship of Jesus, but that the conception which Jesus gives of his work in the discourses is very different and far more nearly related to the old synoptic traditions. He argues that particular sayings of Jesus are given as from an older source and misunderstood and misinterpreted by the author of the historical framework. Further, he proceeds to argue at great length that the connection and meaning of the speeches are injured by having been forced into a narrative framework into which they do not naturally fit. On the one hand you have a number of speeches largely genuine, and on the other hand you have a history that is largely imagined; the result of trying to combine these two elements together is a frequent injury both to the connection and the meaning of the discourses. The conclusion then at which Dr. Wendt arrives is that the source employed by the writer of St. John's Gospels "contained discourses and conversations of Jesus, and as regards the matter recorded in it substantially resembled the Logia of Matthew." The real difficulty of Dr. Wendt's position is the undoubted fact that the style and the doctrine of the speeches ascribed to Jesus in the Fourth Gospel are so different from the style and the doctrine of the sayings in the synoptic Gospels. Dr. Wendt meets this by saying, "When the discourse of one man is preserved through the medium of another, who possesses a strongly-marked individuality and an individual style of thought and speech, it is possible for the second to assimilate the manner of the discourse to his own, while the matter, the real meaning of the original, is correctly reproduced." That is the real issue, and we must confess that we are not convinced by Dr. Wendt on this point. When a man of strong individuality and of original thought assimilates the thought and speech of another and reproduces them in his own way, he cannot be expected to give the real meaning, the essential matter of that other. It is himself he is expressing, himself as impressed and inspired by another, but still essentially himself. The thoughts are not the thoughts of Jesus but the thoughts of a great unknown who had been deeply moved by the life and teaching of Jesus, and who by that life and teaching had been roused to a fuller freedom of independent thought. To believe this makes the speeches full of interest, and does not in our thought detract from their religious significance, but it does prevent us from accepting them as reproducing the matter and meaning of Jesus.

However this may be, every reader of the book will feel that we have in it a most weighty and important contribution to the understanding of John's Gospel. He will not only learn many facts, but he will learn in what spirit and by what methods the facts should be approached, and whether in agreement, or not, with all the arguments he will feel deeply grateful to Dr. Wendt for his book, and will heartily thank Mr. Lummis for the translation.

THE REGISTRAR-GENERAL'S REPORT FOR 1900.

THE Report of the Registrar-General for the year 1900 has just been issued, and, as usual, it contains many matters of interest. We learn that the number of marriages registered during the year was 257,480. This number is 4,854 less than in 1899, but it exceeds the number in any previous year. The war was doubtless the cause of the diminution, and it is really remarkable that the diminution should have been so slight. We are also told that the number of buildings certified for religious worship in 1900 was 616, while 196 were taken off the register, making the total number at the end of the year 24,356. Also at the end of the year there were 15,344 churches and chapels of the Church of England in which marriages might be solemnised, and 12,861 other chapels; the increase during the year being 35 of the Established Church, and 283 of other bodies. In the case of 1,495 of these other chapels, an authorised person had been appointed under the Marriage Act of 1898, the Wesleyan Methodists heading the list with 742 appointments.

Of the 257,480 marriages, 173,060, or 672 per 1,000, were according to the rites of the Established Church. This shows a drop of 4,836 in number, and 6 per 1,000 from the previous year, and is the lowest percentage, or rather permillage, yet reached. The fall in the permillage has been almost continuous—from 849 in 1851, when the tables begin, until the present time.

The Roman Catholic marriages were 10,267 in number, giving a permillage of 40, a reduction of 419 in number, and 1 per 1,000 from the previous year. The permillage has never been lower than this, though it has stood equally low in five previous years.

The Protestant Nonconformist marriages were 32,936, of which 27,243 were recorded by a registrar, and 5,693 by an authorised person under the Act of 1898. These numbers give a permillage of 128, the highest figure yet reached, the increase having been almost constant—from 62 in 1851 to the present time. The actual number of marriages was 323 more in 1900 than in 1899.

Jewish marriages were 1,669 in number, being 3 more than in the previous year, and 6.5 per 1,000, making the highest number and highest permillage in an almost constant increase from 1.7 in 1851.

Civil marriages were 39,471, being 68 more than in 1899, and 153 per 1,000, again the highest point after an almost constant increase from 44 per 1,000 in 1851.

Altogether the permillage of non-church marriages was 328, amounting to nearly one third of the total number.

The permillage of minors at marriage was 51 in the case of husbands and 163 in the case of wives, the latter being the lowest recorded for many years, and the former only 1 per 1,000 above the lowest.

We are sorry to read, however, that 3 girls under 15 years of age, and 14 more under 16 were married during the year, one of the latter being united to a man over 35, while one boy of 15 married a woman aged 21, and two more under 17 married wives of the respective ages of 16 and 19, and two more under 17 married wives aged between 25 and 30. Altogether, however, the rise in the average age at marriage has continued, and the figures now stand at 28-41 years for men, and 26-29 for women.

The percentage of brides and bridegrooms who made a mark instead of signing their names has been steadily decreasing for many years past. The report before us opens with the figures for 1871-5, the same being 185 per 1,000 men and 251 per 1,000 women. In 1900 the figures were only 28 and 32 respectively. The Elementary Education Acts are doubtless to be credited with the bulk of this improvement. Possibly it may surprise our readers to hear that in six districts in the eastern part of London the permillage of illiterates is over 100, and that in Mile End Old Town it stood in 1900 at 211 per 1,000 men, and 292 per 1,000 women. A note of the Registrar-General, however, explains this phenomenon by telling us that the great majority of these illiterates were foreigners who were married by the rites of Jews or Roman Catholics.

The births during the year numbered 927,062, giving the lowest rate on record, and the proportion of boys born to girls was as 1,033 to 1,000. The deaths were 587,830, of which 303,823 were of males and 284,007 of females. The proportion of deaths of infants under one year old to births, was as 154 to 1,000; on this head the rate was highest in Lancashire, where it stood at 180. A. D. T.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the above Assembly was held at Altrincham on Thursday, June 12. It was well attended, and its proceedings were marked by enthusiasm and unanimity. At the morning service the Supporter was the Rev. R. T. Elliott, and the Preacher the Rev. H. S. Tayler, M.A. It probably was the first occasion on record when audible applause followed the conclusion of the sermon; but it was not surprising, as the sermon was an impassioned and eloquent plea for a continuance of the spirit of heroic resistance which characterised our brave forefathers in the faith.

THE SERMON.

The text was taken from Hebrews xii. 4, "Ye have not yet resisted unto blood." In the course of his sermon the preacher said, "When hard and cruel laws like the Conventicle Act, the Five Mile Act, and the Test Act oppressed Nonconformists, no one can say that our forefathers did not resist, even to the uttermost. They bravely fought a long hard battle for the right to worship God according to their consciences. Not to them, but rather to the present generation the words apply, 'Ye have not yet resisted.' Let it be admitted that the enthusiasm of our ancestors was not misplaced, and that they suffered not in vain. Is that the whole truth? Are we not bound to recognise that it is not so much what they gained, but the way they gained it that is of importance to us, that the efforts they put forth carried with them a peculiar religious discipline, that their self-sacrifice purified their vision, and made them capable of beholding new truth. Can we share their nobility of soul by accepting the results of their labours without sharing the struggle? Is it true that any faith passively accepted will exert its full sanctifying, uplifting, vitalising power over humanity? Is not wrestling the indispensable condition of blessing? Do not men grow strong when they struggle to overcome the difficulties of their environment? The future of our churches is, of course, with the young. Would it be a libel to say of a portion of them Ye have not yet resisted to the utmost, or known the resistance that makes strong? When I fasten my gaze on the young people of the working classes, I notice signs of gentler spirit and smoother manners; but in noting the absence of the old brusqueness and scars of battle, I miss a certain firmness, robustness and staunchness that characterised their fathers and made them such a valuable asset in connection with any cause they once espoused. Or consider the young people connected with our chapels who come from better-to-do families. I say connected, but I fear the connection is often slight, inasmuch as the rising generation is little under the influence of these centres of worship, and much under the influence of the world outside. Our young people are brought up scrupulously free from any special religious view, they are sent to the public schools and there come under influences skilfully designed to make them members of a particular Church. These may fail, but the influences of comradeship and a natural desire to stand well with others, and perhaps a desire for social advantage, all tend to alienate them in sympathy from their first religious home; and presently the chapel that might have flourished with their aid grows weak by their absence—i.e., the absence of those who would have been best able to help it, and who would themselves have greatly profited by fearlessly espousing its cause and taking a responsible share in its management. What can we do? The first requisite is not so much definiteness of theological conviction, but definite conviction of the religious consciousness—a sense of the seriousness of life, of solemn responsibility to God, and a knowledge that itis often times necessary to say "no" to the world in order to say "yes" to the heavenly vision. If once a passion for light and truth be stimulated, and the spiritual faculties set working in thankful exercise, then we may rest confident that the soul will go on expanding, growing stronger and stronger, resisting every shadow of evil or falsehood, and we need have no fears as to the result. The discipline we have to offer is that of religious culture. Tendencies of the age assail us on every side where we least expect danger, and they have so fair and winsome an aspect that it is hard to meet them with resistance. No foe appears to challenge us, but the subtle, steady, persistent influence of forces tending to lower ideals whose existence we honestly recognise, may be the most dangerous of foes. The holiest life ever lived on earth was of one who found himself in antagonism with the Scribes and Pharisees and the spirit of his age. If Christ opposed, should not his modern disciples follow in his steps? Are there many parents to be found in our churches who to-day avoid difficulties for their children, who would choose for them the easy path of conformity, who would have them think as other people do? Let them pause and consider whether, whatever the cost, whatever the painful resistance necessary, it would not be a hundred times better to pay the cost than avoid it and lose the boon of independence of thought that leads on to a noble character and a strong and pure and holy faith. Would youth, fired with any glowing ideal of his inheritance, be deterred by the difficulties of his position? Would he not respond and gladly enrol himself under the old banner of truth, liberty, and religion? The old struggle is not over, if the battlefield has changed; never can it be over so long as humanity remains the same and there is a choice between higher and lower ideals. The battle is one in which light fights with darkness, purity with impurity, truth with error, and love with hate."

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The business meeting was held in the chapel in the afternoon, when the President, the Rev. C. T. POYNTING, B.A., occupied the chair, and there was a large attendance of ministers and delegates. In his address the President said it was his privilege as President of that Assembly to give expression to their feelings of thankfulness for the peace which was proclaimed last week. Every member of the vast British Empire now united in the one sense of relief that at last our soldiers were able to lay down their arms and greet as comrades, and soon as fellow-citizens, the brave people with whom we had been fighting now for over two years and a half—a people who had won our respect, nay, our admiration, for their bravery, their patient endurance and loyalty to their own national life. There had been few wars in which the adversaries on both sides had so evidently respected each other, and in which there had been so little personal animosity. We were proud to welcome such a brave people as fellow-citizens, and we could only repeat the words of the special prayer used on Sunday last—that both we and those who had lately been our enemies might henceforward be filled with the spirit of mutual generosity and goodwill, and that, as each had striven to prevail over the other in battle, each might now strive to vie with each other in justice and loving-kindness. The war time had been a time of sadness for them all, not only on account of the losses occasioned by death, disease, and waste of the resources which were made for the welfare of the people, but because of the divisions and contentions which diversity of opinion as to the origin and responsibility for the war had occasioned. Let them trust that they at home might be willing to forget their contentions and agree to strive for those things which made for peace, and turn with renewed consecration of themselves to the great questions which demanded their very gravest attention—questions of education, temperance, the social condition of the people, questions from which the all-absorbing interest of the war had too long diverted their attention. Let them trust that their too-divided ranks might now close up as they all set themselves to the work of "peace, retrenchment, and reform." Turning to subjects of more special interest, he referred to the losses which had been caused by death amongst their number during the year, spoke in sympathetic terms of the trials of bereavement and sickness which had overtaken several of our aged and honoured ministers; and then extended a welcome to those ministers who have settled recently in the Province. The President referred also to the raising of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, which, he said, would secure to ministers outside of the province many of the advantages those within the province enjoyed. Speaking of the duty of the minister of religion to help his people to harmonise the thought of God with the scientific and philosophic thought of the day, he said it was here some of the most serious of the minister's difficulties arose. To-day the interest of all doctrine was found in its record of the history of human thought as the progressive attempts of the human mind to give distinct and intelligible form to what was felt to be divine realities. Doctrine was now valued not because it was deemed to be final or absolute truth, but because it was the embodiment of that which was of infinitely more importance, the divine idea to which human thought and experience must seek to give expression. That change had been going on with far greater rapidity in other Churches even than in their own. The orthodoxy of tradition, the orthodoxy against which the old Unitarianism was a protest—and a very brave and sturdy protest too—was to-day but a survival, and the new orthodoxy which was finding expression in the pulpits of all the Churches in the preaching of those who were attempting to assimilate the real and living thought of the day, was a very different thing, and a thing their relation to which it was very difficult to define. As they looked around they beheld a liberal spirit growing up in all the Churches. The very rapid and vigorous growth of that liberal spirit caused a reaction. It had ever been so in their own Churches. But they need not fear. Let them thank God and trust themselves to Him for guidance in the future as their fathers did in the past. The Kingdom, the coming of which they prayed for daily, was the Kingdom neither of sect nor denomination nor any such thing. It was the Kingdom of God where God Himself should rule in all their hearts to guide them all into paths of righteousness, peace, and love.

Mr. F. Monks (Warrington) was unanimously elected President of the Assembly, Mr. J. Dendy was re-elected treasurer, and the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson and R. T. Herford secretaries.

Mr. J. DENDY read the balance-sheet, which showed a balance in hand of £118.

Upon the invitation of the Rev. J. J. Wright it was resolved to hold the next annual Provincial Assembly at Chowbent.

Public Questions.

The annual report on public questions was presented. It referred in terms of thankfulness to the termination of the war in South Africa, and with regard to the Education Bill stated that it demanded the most careful attention of the Assembly. The measure itself was an outcome of the compromise of 1870, and showed once more the danger lurking in every compromise. The report (from which we quoted in our leader of last week) discussed at length the provisions of the Bill, and expressed the belief that the Assembly, while joining in gratitude to the Churches for what they did for education in the old days, would not be prepared to see a Bill passed to place the education of the people permanently in clerical hands, to the sacrifice of the true interests of the nation, without joining in a supreme effort to defeat it. The report also expressed approval of the Home Secretary's Licensing Bill, and touched upon the subject of gambling.

The Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG moved the reception of the report. He said a nightmare had been lifted from all their hearts, and they were awaking to a new dawn. They would not look back to the horrors of the dark night which had flown; they would look forward with hope to the day which they trusted was about to dawn. We stood not only in the first days of this peace but also in the foregleam of the Coronation of the King, and he was bound to confess that his own interest in that event was greatly accentuated by the fact that he believed the peace to be the King's peace. They could but express their admiration, not only, as had already been done, for the endurance, the courage, and the high patriotism of our late foes, but also for the magnificent spirit in which, once having accepted our terms, leaders and people appeared to have vied with each other in so disposing the hearts of the South African Dutch that the peace should be the beginning of a happy friendship and a prosperous fellow-citizenship. Nor should they omit a tribute of great admiration to a man whom some of them had at times felt called upon to sternly criticise—the great English General who, by his manly utterance and his direct and simple appeal to the hearts of the people with whom he had had to negotiate, had done so much to infuse a true and hopeful spirit into the new order of things. We were, however, but at the beginning, and the hopes we cherished would only be realised if the English people and their leaders maintained the high, generous, and just spirit of the last week or two through the long years and generations that were to come. He trusted we should see to it that not only to our white fellow-citizens but also to the dark and swarthy races of the great continent justice would generously be dealt out. Those who had borne much obloquy in the last two or three years might congratulate themselves that, even in their weakness, they had not been without effective strength. There could be no question that the attitude taken up by many of those who were denounced as the enemies of their country had had much to do first with the cessation of farm-burning, afterwards with the improvement of the concentration camps, and now with the conditions of peace which had been concluded. Upon the Education Bill, Mr. Armstrong said one struggle was closed and another was beginning. He hoped those who had been disunited to a certain extent on the question of the war would stand shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart in the battle for free education that was about to be waged. Upon the question of temperance he found himself in the position of heartily backing the Bill introduced by the Government.

Mr. E. B. BROADRICK (Dukinfield) seconded the resolution, which was adopted.

The Education Bill.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON moved that the following Petition to the House of Commons be adopted:—

That the Education Bill now before your Honourable House is a measure drawn not in the interests of that Educational Efficiency which is the nation's most vital need, but in the interests of the Churches.

That its inevitable result will be to hand over the Elementary Schools in larger degree to clerical control, with all its blighting influence upon education; while, by its suppression of School Boards, the Bill will destroy the agencies which have, in the last thirty years, done the most to raise the standard of efficiency in the nation's schools, and to bring the people, by their chosen representatives, into direct touch with them, and to stimulate popular interest in their management.

That, by capturing the Rates for Denominational Schools, mainly Church of England and Roman Catholic, and destined to remain under denominational control by a two-thirds majority on the managing Committees, the Bill is guilty of a flagrant breach of the principle of the ratepayers managing the expenditure of their own rates, while inflicting a grievous injustice on the conscience of Nonconformists.

That, in view of the new duties confided to the County and Borough Councils in relation to the Elementary Schools, there will be a great danger of the sectarian spirit, now happily absent, entering into the elections, and the conduct of the business, of these bodies.

That the new educational authorities will not be directly elected at all, but be nominated, thus withdrawing them from the invigorating sense of responsibility to the people.

That a fatal blot in the Bill is the exclusion of women from direct election, as now, upon the educational authorities.

That with a view to economy of the rates, already heavily burdened, the Councils will be led irresistibly to encourage the multiplication of voluntary schools, with their five shillings aid grant, and generally to starve Elementary Education.

That the Teaching Profession will be more than ever shut against Nonconformists by the inevitable increase in the numbers of Church of England Schools; and that the Bill will do nothing to provide the National Unsectarian Training Colleges for Teachers, so greatly needed,

That the merely permissive twopenny rate for Secondary Education is lamentably insufficient, especially in view of the Cockerton Judgment, handing over Evening Continuation, and Higher Elementary, Schools, and Pupil Teacher Centres, to Secondary Education; and that the latter, the most vital necessity of the nation, is hardly touched by the Bill.

That your Petitioners therefore pray your Honourable House to reject the Bill.

Mr. Dowson examined the provisions of the Bill critically, and in the course of a severe condemnation of the measure said it was simply one to give such life to the denominational system, placing the priest in control of it, that it would take Free Churchmen all their time to defeat its baneful influence.

The Rev. J. C. POLLARD seconded the resolution which was carried unanimously; and Mr. Dowson then announced that Mr. James Bryce, M.P., had promised to present the Petition.

The Licensing Question.

The Rev. J. C. STREET proposed a resolution condemning the introdution of the Government Licensing Bill, and urging that it should be passed without any weakening of its essential provisions. The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded, and it was passed unanimously. It was resolved that copies be forwarded to the Prime Minister, Mr. Balfour and Mr. Ritchie.

The report of the work of the District Missionary Societies was received by resolution. It stated that about £2,600 had been expended by the various societies during the year 1901.

On the motion of the Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE, the following resolution was also passed:—"That, following the precedent of the resolution passed at Bury, June 18, 1896, in relation to the Manchester Bazaar in 1897, this Assembly sanctions the holding of a Stall, in the name of the Assembly, at the Bazaar to be held by the East Cheshire Christian Union in October, 1903, to raise the sum of £5,000 for the purposes of the Union."

THE EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in St. Margaret's Church Institute under the chairmanship of Mr. GODFREY WORTHINGTON. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to the Altrincham minister and congregation for their hospitality and for the admirable arrangements made for the comfort and convenience of the visitors.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS delivered an address on "Organisation." He said it was our duty to press forward the organisation of our affairs more earnestly than we at present do. Our conservations might easily be excessive, and certainly our young men ought not to be snubbed or suppressed when they desire to emphasise this need. What we stand for specifically is a principle of thinking and speaking the truth; not by the method of predetermination but by free inquiry—free as to method but not as to conscience. We need intellectual veracity; not in the mere adjectival sense, for it is the main thing. It is our duty to carry that principle with effect into the world. It is slurred and forgotten in the Churches. We must teach the world to be true. This is the thing to which we are sent to testify—namely, the duty of thinking and feeling truly. Freedom also is our boast; but that depends upon our love of truth. Organisation doesn't curtail freedom. Executive needn't prove a chain or a curb. It is possible for Churches to unite themselves in an executive without forfeiting their freedom. How can we perfect ourselves or our Churches in isolation? For want of organisation we are impairing our intellectual life.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON spoke on "Missions—District and Domestic." He traced their origins, and showed in what they have differed and still do differ; but said that under the changed conditions Domestic Missions were really another kind of Church, and that it would much simplify our organisations and be to the interest of both kinds of Missions if they were under the control of one governing body.

The Rev. H. E. DOWSON delivered a stirring address on "The Church and the World," which made a deep impression upon those who heard it.

During the evening the Dunham-road Chapel Choir sang some glees, and led the singing of the hymns.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting of this Union was held at Huddersfield on Wednesday, June 11. A religious service was conducted in the afternoon in the Fitzwilliam-street Church by the Rev. W. MELLOR, when the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. H. Gow, of Leicester.

After tea Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT, J.P., of Leeds, President of the Union, took the chair, supported by the Revs. C. Hargrove, A. Chalmers, E. C. Jones, J. E. Manning, C. Harvey-Cook, J. M. Whiteman, J. H. Green, J. Dale, W. Mellor, H. Gow, and Charles Roper (representing the Manchester District and the B. and F.U.A.), Mr. G. Webster (hon. treasurer), Mr. E. Basil Lupton (hon. sec.) and others.

Thanks were accorded to Mr. Gow for his sermon, and the SECRETARY then read the annual report, which gave particulars of the churches included in the Union, and noted the value of the quarterly record Forward, edited by the Rev. C. Harvey-Cook. The proposal to hold a big bazaar in 1903 was also recorded.

The Treasurer's statement showed receipts from subscriptions and collections £611 1s. 4d., and an expenditure of £53 3s. 3d. beyond the income. The report of the Postal Mission also showed that valuable work had been done.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, acknowledged the hospitality of the Huddersfield congregation, and offered to them the good wishes of the Union. When Mr. Mellor came to Huddersfield he had to labour under many disadvantages, but they were not disheartened, and believed that Huddersfield would yet be made a good congregation, and that some of its former influence and position would return to it. Other dependent congregations were working under great difficulties, but there were numerous encouraging prospects. It was the aim of the Union that no congregation should cease to exist, but that all possible help should be rendered to those that were weak and struggling. Speaking of the subscription list and collections, he feared there was a large amount of indifferentism in many of their congregations respecting the important claims of the Union. He believed that it was a wrong position for a congregation to take to give a minister as little as they possibly could. The minister was worthy of his hire, and he ought to be maintained at any rate in comfort. Having referred to the removal of the Rev. J. Ellis and the coming departure of the Rev. J. E. Manning from the Province, and also to their thankfulness for the restoration of peace, he urged Unitarians to maintain their principles. Unitarianism was certainly extending. There was a marked difference to-day in the teaching of so-called "orthodox churches" from that which formerly prevailed. He did not say that it was all due to the influence of Unitarianism, but the fact was that a "Liberal Christianity" was making headway. They were exceedingly grateful to their lay preachers and their members for the work already done, and he appealed for more enthusiasm and financial support for the work of the Union.

The resolution, having been seconded by the Rev. J. E. MANNING, was adopted. The officers were then appointed, and the Rev. E. C. JONES moved a vote of thanks to the lay preachers, paying a warm tribute to their self-sacrifice and devotion.

The Rev. C. ROPER (representing the B. and F.U.A.) congratulated the Union on their work, and urged yet further efforts to extend their influence.

Mr. E. O. DODGSON (Leeds) moved the following resolution on the Education Bill:—

That this meeting protests in the strongest manner possible against the Education Bill now before Parliament for the following reasons:—(1.) It removes the schools of the people from direct popular control. (2.) It threatens the Board Schools with extinction. (3.) It proposes to lay on the ratepayers the burden of supporting denominational schools, over which they will have no effective control. (4.) It contains no provisions which are likely to secure increased efficiency in either elementary or secondary education.

In moving the resolution, he remarked that in introducing the Education Bill into the House of Commons, Mr. Balfour advanced three claims for the measure—that it constituted the educational authority, secured educational improvement, and effected a final settlement. All three contentions were fallacious. The two paramount objects of the Bill were the abolition of School Boards and the relief of Voluntary Schools. After criticising the constitution of the new education authorities, he pointed out that the Bill proposed a complete negation of the system of popular control for education, and substituted a system that could not directly appeal to the stimulus of the people in their interest in education. That was the great blot of the Government Bill. It was false to contend that the Bill was going to solve the education problem. It would not improve education. It meant that they would either have to lower the standard of education in Board Schools or raise the standard of efficiency in Voluntary Schools. To achieve the latter would involve an obligation and an expense that the rating authorities would decline to accept and incur. Therefore, educational efficiency would suffer. As to secondary education, he believed that no County Council would acquiesce in finding the adequate funds for its efficient carrying out.

The resolution was seconded by Councillor OWEN BALMFORTH, a member of the Huddersfield School Board, and passed.

A vote of thanks to the Huddersfield congregation brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—On Wednesday week Miss C. A. Lawrence, of London, delivered a lecture on "The Horse" to members of the Band of Mercy, recently founded by Mrs. W. Jenkin Davies. Miss Lawrence spoke very forcibly on the cruelty inflicted on horses by the use of bearing-reins. Her model of the horse and her pictures were very much appreciated. The Rev. W. Jenkin Davies, Mr. Orr, and Mr. Young delivered short speeches, while members of the band sang and recited. On Sunday the annual floral service was held. The Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A., delivered a very telling address on "A Sower went forth to Sow." The address, as well as the morning sermon by Mr. Gordon, were highly admired. The church was beautifully decorated. The congregations throughout the day were good and the collections satisfactory. In the evening the Rev. W. J. Davies preached on "The Story of the Converts."

Chichester.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary services were held, the morning being specially for the children and the evening for parents. Both services were much enjoyed, and the usual collection was taken for the forthcoming treat, July 10. The new dean (Hannah) has invited all the Sunday schools, including "The Unitarian," to a short musical service at the Cathedral on July 6, when he will give a brief address to them.

Glossop.—The anniversary services were held on June 15, and were a splendid success. The annual procession of members, teachers, and scholars was larger than ever before. The congregations filled the church, seats having to be provided in the aisle in the evening. The collections surpassed all previous records, the amount realised being nearly £53. The Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport, was the visiting minister, and his discourses gave great satisfaction to his hearers.

Godalming.—Some vigorous letters in opposition to the Education Bill, now before Parliament, have been addressed by the Rev. Hubert Clarke to the local Press.

Guildford.—The flower services were held on Sunday, June 15, the church being decorated for the occasion. Despite bad weather the services were well attended. The Lessons were impressively read in the morning by Mr. Alderman Edwin Ellis, J.P., and in the evening by the Rev. Hubert Clark. At the children's service in the afternoon prizes for attendance were presented to the children by Miss le Duc. The special songs, arranged for the occasion by the organist and choir, included a solo admirably rendered by Miss Florence Morgan.

Hinckley.—The anniversary Sunday-school services were held at the Great Meeting last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. E. I. Fripp, B.A., of Mansfield. There was a full congregation in the afternoon and a crowded one at night. The collections were larger than for some years past. The scholars sang specially-prepared hymns and a setting of Browning's "The Year's at the Spring." The choir sang an anthem, with Mr. W. Rowlett at the organ. Flowers and plants filled the chapel table. A fine day crowned with eclat a most inspiriting and successful anniversary.

London: Essex Church.—Mr. Gordon Cooper, B.A., who graduated at Lincoln College, and has just concluded his theological course at Manchester College, has been appointed assistant minister for a year at Essex Church, and will commence duty on the second Sunday in July. The collection for the Provincial Assembly on "Assembly Sunday" amounted to £41 15s. 7d., and that for the hospitals on "Hospital Sunday" to £139 11s. 5d.

Ministers' Conference at Hucklow.—The experiment, which was tried last year, of occupying the Holiday Home during one of the vacant weeks by a party of ministers, was so successful that it has just been repeated. From June 2 to 7 ministers from towns in Lancashire, Cheshire, and Derbyshire were in residence, some for a day or two, others for a longer period. Visits were paid during the daytime to some of the places of interest in the locality, and the evenings were devoted to conferences. Papers were read by the Revs. Dr. Griffiths on "New Methods of Missionary Work," A. H. Dolphin on "Forms of Worship," and Walter Reynolds, B.A., on "The Relation of the Unitarian to the Evangelical Churches." Animated and helpful discussions followed. A pleasant time was spent, and before the close a committee was appointed, with the Rev. W. R. Shanks as secretary, to arrange for another gathering in 1903.

Scarborough.—The twenty-eighth annual congregational meeting of the Westborough Unitarian Church was held on Friday, the 13th inst. The annual report detailed the activities of the church year, and noted the good results following the settlement of the Rev. Ottwell Binns, late of Portland, in July. The collections and other receipts were considerably more than in the previous year, and the adverse balance much less. The Sunday-school also showed a slight increase in numbers, and a Band of Hope was established in the autumn. The Literary and Musical Society was reorganised under the name of the Social Union, and the experiment of having more frequent meetings during the session successfully carried out. A Young People's Guild was formed during the year, and held a variety of interesting and helpful meetings. After the election of the committee, and a vote of thanks to the retiring officers, the Rev. O. Binns gave a short address, and said he could assure his hearers that the last year had been the happiest of all his twelve years' ministry. There was plenty of room for a few cheerful prophets, excellent opportunities for helping those who have broken with the old idea of religion, but are still essentially religious. For these their church would be a spiritual home if its real character was shown to them. Mr. Binns further pleaded that the church should be used for the worship of God as well as for the welfare of humanity. Light refreshments and social intercourse brought to a close a most encouraging meeting.

Shrewsbury.—On Sunday, June 8, the 112th anniversary connected with the Sunday-school of High-street Church took place. At each service the Rev. J. C. Street spoke on two texts, so as to comment on the news of peace and subjects more closely connected with the chief object of the services. Satisfactory collections were taken on behalf of the Sunday-school. The following Thursday the school had its annual excursion to Church Stretton.

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

EDWARD THE SEVENTH.

GOD SAVE THE KING.

GOD save our Sovereign King;
Loud let the Anthem ring,
God save the King!
Humbly we look to Thee,
Lord of Eternity!
Let him Thy mercy see!
God save the King!

May he in all things prove Worthy a nation's love:
A noble King.
Where they, the Mighty Dead,
Through the long years have led,
Lord, let Thy servant tread.
God save the King!

Upright in word and deed,
May he his people lead;
Edward, our King.
Through gladness or distress,
In truth and righteousness
May he Thy law confess!
God save the King!

Lord! Hear a nation's prayer:
Keep in Thy holy care
Our gracious Queen.
True in her womanhood;
Earnest in all things good,
She in Thy light has stood!
God bless our Queen.

Hear, too, O Lord Most High,
A nation's humble cry:
Great King of Kings!
Bless Thou our country dear;
Keep in Thy faith and fear;
Sheltered for ever near Beneath Thy wings!

H. W. HAWKES.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WITH profound sorrow and the gravest anxiety the nation is watching by the bedside of the King, and with the deepest sympathy for the Queen and the members of the Royal Family, and indeed for all to whom this sudden reversal must mean not only bitter disappointment but serious calamity. We have judged it best to adhere to the arrangements made, and to publish THE INQUIRER this week on Wednesday, and are thankful that the early morning account of the King's condition is as satisfactory as could be expected.

THE INQUIRER will next month be sixty years old, the first number having been published July 9, 1842; and next week's issue, for July 5, will be a special anniversary number, which will contain some record of the past, a statement of our ideal and our hopes for the future, and a number of greetings from friends near and distant, expressive of their goodwill and good wishes for the old paper.

In this last June number, the Editor had expected, for many months past, to write some Valedictory words, on his retirement from a post which he has now held for four and a-half years. That would have been an occasion for the expression of much gratitude to a wide circle of friends for help most generously given, for earnest words of encouragement and appreciation in times of difficulty. It might also have brought a frank confession of shortcomings, and a last attempt to put into words that should not miss their mark, the ideal he had aimed at, in the conduct of this journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life.

FATE, however, has otherwise decreed, and his neck is to remain in the collar. He did not, at the first, seek this difficult post of duty, nor has he sought to retain it, but has simply asked to be used in the service as should be judged best by those with whom the responsibility must rest. Instead, therefore, of now saying farewell he must set his face to go forward, and is thankful to be assured of abundant support and of the generous sympathy also of those who had proposed another course. The next six months must prove whether it has been worth while to make this effort to secure for THE INQUIRER a greater power of usefulness and a wider influence for good.

WITH Dr. Klein's paper on the transition "From Roman Catholic to Unitarian" we complete this week the publication of the series of five addresses on "Types of Religious Experience," which proved of so much interest when given at the Conference of the B. and F.U.A. in Whitweek. Whether these addresses will be published together in a separate volume has not yet, we understand, been decided, but we are glad, at any rate, to have had the opportunity of furnishing our readers with so valuable and interesting a record. And this week we are at last able to publish also Mr. Tchertkoff's Whitsuntide address, and to commend it to the earnest consideration of our readers. As to the matter dealt with in the section on Prayer and Worship we find ourselves in complete disagreement with Mr. Tchertkoff. We cannot feel that united prayer is forbidden by the injunction of Jesus, nor that the critical faculty can interfere with the true utterance either of private or public prayer in common; but Mr. Tchertkoff's plea for spiritual reality, an for the part true religion must play in grappling with the problems of our social life, is one to which we all ought to attend.

THE annual meeting of the Association of Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterians was held on Wednesday week in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast. The annual sermon was preached by the outgoing President, the Rev. M. S. Dunbar, M.A., Mr. Thomas Andrews, D.L., the new President, subsequently taking the chair. As to the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund it was reported:—

Some of the churches took up the work heartily, and made a satisfactory and helpful response by individual contributions or congregational collections. From a few of the churches no response of any sort could be obtained. The Irish contribution towards the £23,000 of which the fund consists stands so far at about £800.

On the motion of the Rev. D. Walmsley, seconded by the Rev. F. Thomas, a special committee was appointed to consider the following suggestions:—

(1) To invite each constituent congregation to appoint, say, three lay delegates expressly to represent it at the annual meeting; (2) to change the method by which the preacher of the annual sermon is appointed, so as to give greater freedom of choice; (3) to hold the annual meeting not always at the same church or in the same town; (4) to make an evening meeting for social intercourse and earnest speech on matters of importance part of the regular proceedings of the annual meeting; (5) to change the date of the annual meeting to a time which shall promise a better attendance of our people.

ORGANISATION AND LIFE.

BY THE REV. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, D.D., PRESIDENT OF THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.*

Now, having said these things, it is good to remind ourselves that he who lingers long in the consideration of the mechanism of the religious life is missing that for which this Association really stands. Let it not be supposed that any one who is interested in the better organisation of religious freedom loses sight of the main purpose of his work because he must give deliberate thought and patient drudgery to the efficient administration of business affairs. We all know that the ends we seek are more important than the means; and, however much we may plan together to improve and enlarge our work, we do not lose sight of the vision of service which impels and mightily attracts us. It is a superficial habit of mind that disparages institutions, for institutions are only another name for the organised forces of life by which God moves in the world; but it is undoubtedly and profoundly true, and no less so because I quote a distinguished bishop of the Protestant Episcopal communion, that "we no sooner have an institution, whether in society or education or politics, than we are threatened with the danger that the institution may exaggerate its own importance, and harden and stiffen into a mere machine." Let us, then, as we gather here, not forget that the one thing for which this Association stands is simply public serviceableness. Let us recognise that the end of all our mechanism and ministry is simply to impart life.

The officers of your Association, whether wisely or unwisely, assume that they are more than administrators. They refuse to permit their activities to be limited to the mere running of a machine. They crave the exercise of spiritual gifts, and desire to seize large opportunities of service which open always before our faltering advance. They desire to be your officers, not by means of "the petty mechanism of officialism," but by the honest, manly, and unwearying proclamation of the truth, by endeavouring to lead their fellow-workers to the mount of vision from which man may see God and His righteousness, and become aware of the fact that they are fellow-workers with the Most High.

If I may interpret the inner spirit of this organisation, it represents your effort to solve the problems of the common good, to lead men out of isolated, self-centered interest into the brave, self-effacing service of the modern world. It represents a generous and healthy movement of human life and thought. It is an effort not to systematise religious life, but to revive the religious life, not to originate a doctrinal system, but to restore a vital system, to bring to the world weary of theological debate, perplexed by insoluble problems, troubled by the restlessness of the modern spirit, the tonic visitation of new hopes and ideals.

The regeneration of Christian thought and life which we desire and in a measure represent may proceed in many ways. Let me repeat a wise word of Dr. Peabody's. The method of organisation and the method of inspiration both have their place in any healthy religious movement. Probably there has been no era in history so devoted as ours to progress by means of associated effort, by legislation, by schemes and programmes; and there is large hope and promise in this new power of united action and sense of mutual responsibility. No church can maintain its self-respect to-day without some adequate routine of worshipping, giving, working, and playing. This is an undoubted element in the spirit of our generation, and we shall be blind indeed if we do not recognise its blessing.

Yet we must not forget that such organisation is really nothing more than the channel through which human personality can effectively work. Organisation simply magnifies the power of the individual, and without the power of the individual organisation is practically impotent. The great religious movements of the world have not been advanced through machinery. They have represented the perpetuated influence of transforming persons. Said Phillips Brooks, "It is not the discriminating critic, but he whose beating, throbbing life offers itself a channel for divine force: he is the man through whom the world grows rich, and whom it remembers with perpetual thanksgiving." The religious organisation and the religious originator are both necessary; but of the two, the more important is the originative impulse of personality. The final unit is the man, and beneath all religious organisation there must be the sense of personal responsibility and the consciousness of the relation of the individual to the source of abundant life. No mechanical device or external change can supplant this personal dynamic.

I have always believed—and experience only deepens my conviction—that the scant resources of this Association in its work of church extension should be applied in the employment of diligent, faithful, and consecrated ministers rather than to the support of loosely organised and often irresponsible societies. The best investment this Association can make is an investment in men. If we can find apostolic men, apostolic achievements will spring up around them as matters of course. The Unitarian cause will advance just as fast and as far as our churches are able to discover well-trained, tactful, courageous, and devout ministers for their leaders; and the robustness of our spiritual life, the health of our institutions, can be displayed in no better way than by the constant and increasing production of alert, vigorous, manly youths for this high service. The very difficulties of the tasks which await such ministers should only make the appeal the stronger to chivalrous young men. Never was there such chance as the religious world to-day presents for the work of men of insight, human sympathy, and self-control. It should be the privilege of this Association to provide broad channels through which the energy and idealism of such servants of God can flow to the refreshing and invigorating of the land.

* A Portion of the President's Address at the seventy-seventh annual meeting of the A.U.A., in the Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass., May 27.

AT the recent anniversary meetings of the American Unitarian Association in Boston a cordial welcome was given to the Rev. W. Garrett Horder, of the Ealing Congregational Church, Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden, and Professor T. G. Masaryk, of Prague. Mr. Horder, who is well known on both sides of the Atlantic, as editor of the "Treasury of American Sacred Song," had been lecturing in the States on Hymnology, and was welcomed by the President as "our first authority in the religious poetry of our mother tongue, the careful and assiduous student of American poetry, and its accomplished editor."

In his reply Mr. Horder spoke of the home feeling he had found in America, and the difficulty he had of realising that there were two Congregational Churches in that country, his own and the Unitarian. Speaking of a visit to Craigie House and Elmwood, he said:—

Those two houses to me, sir, were enchanted ground. It was through Prof. Longfellow that as a boy I first learned to love poetry; and Lowell is one of the men whose writings I not only appreciate with my mind, but love in my heart. But, then, I have a very uncomfortable feeling about these men. You know they would have all belonged to the proper Congregational Church if it had not been for those old Calvinistic dogmatists. They would all have been in my church.

When I was trying to edit the book that Dr. Eliot has spoken so kindly of,—and I did it for this country, sir, not for my own,—"The Treasury of American Sacred Song,"—I found that the vast proportion of your poets and sweet singers hailed from Harvard University; and, when I was there yesterday, I told them that that had been a nest of singing birds, just as our Cambridge in olden times had been the same. And I had an uncomfortable feeling that all these men and women ought to have been in my church; and, if it had not been for those old dogmatists, you would all have been there, and you would not have had this separate meeting.

I sometimes think how history would have been altered if years ago there had been a guiding spirit like Phillips Brooks. How it would have been rewritten! But there was no such spirit. And so, unfortunately, the old Congregational Church has been rent into two divisions. But I hope and believe that these two divisions will not be eternal.

If only the dogmatists would stand aside and let them interpret Christianity in the terms of life, he felt that they would come together heart to heart.

HE had such great delight in hymnology and poetry, Mr. Horder said, because they offered the true ideas for religion. And he added:—

We must get this great faith of ours interpreted as it ought to be,—in terms of life. Let us lay the accent upon the right point,—"the grace,"—"the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost,"—let us get rid of the mathematical propositions,—the one in three and the three in one,—and lay the stress where it ought to be, upon grace, love, fellowship.

I have caught the Christian note, the deeply Christian note, in this Boston,—in your church. I felt it to-day in the spirit that animated this meeting. And I pray, sir, that we may get into the right vein, into the right idiom, and come together,—not, it may be, quite mind to mind, but heart to heart, and try to build up what this world so sorely needs,—the kngdom of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.

LET not future things disturb thee, for thou wilt come to them if it shall be necessary, having with thee the same reason which now thou usest for present things.—Marcus Antoninus.

TYPES OF RELIGION EXPERIENCE.

V.—"FROM ROMAN CATHOLIC TO UNITARIAN."

BY THE REV. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN, D.SC.*

I HAVE been asked to read a short paper on the "type of religious experience" of which personal circumstances have given me special knowledge. All such experience, however typical, must, of course, vary considerably in each individual case, and it is not easy to dwell upon so personal a topic without sometimes losing sight of its chief impersonal elements. This difficulty may, however, be lessened by the fact that in the case of Roman Catholicism we have probably the most definite Christian type of religious experience. It is most definite because we know exactly its starting point. In the case of members of the various Protestant bodies, the starting-point is never so clearly defined, either for us who are looking on or even for the earnest inquirer himself. There is an element of freedom, even in the narrower forms of Protestantism which to a certain extent favours instability of thought, and thus renders somewhat obscure the beginnings of religious evolution.

The Roman Catholic Position clearly Defined.

This can hardly be the case with a fairly-educated Catholic. His Church claims the power of defining what he is to believe, and whether this power be heavenly or earthly in its source, at any rate the Roman Church has fully exercised it. She has gradually brought under strict dogmatic control every doctrine — almost every thought—as it came within her range in the course of ages; she has reduced her decisions to a system learnedly codified and comparatively easy of access; she has a vast organisation for the purpose of teaching that system, and its main features are embodied in short catechisms, issued under authority, whose pithy sentences, adapted to the needs of the young and the unlearned, convey definite religious belief to the rising generation. This belief is represented as having infallible divine sanction, and any doubt about it, any wilful departure from it, is reckoned as the gravest sin. This is the starting-point of religious experience for every faithful Catholic. Excluding, as this starting-point does, every element of mental freedom in respect to almost all fundamental ideas bearing upon religion, it may well be asked by those outside the sphere of such experience how a man can conscientiously begin to move out of such a position at all.

The Beginning of Doubt.

To begin is, indeed, the most serious difficulty, the most painful and pathetic stage in the whole process, undoubtedly the most typical of all experiences of the kind.

At first a doubt will arise about some point of doctrine, perhaps about the virtue of sacraments, or the inspiration of the Bible, or the authority of the Church; such doubts for most Protestants would be doubts and nothing more, "honest" doubts, as Tennyson says, in which there may be as much faith or even more faith than in half the creeds. To an earnest Catholic doubts assume at once a very different aspect. He is taught to look upon all such doubts as evil thoughts, subtle temptations which, if entertained even for a moment, may imply actual sin; the doubt itself is not a sin, but any deliberate, objective attention given to the doubt with even half an admission that there may be in it something justifying inquiry, is already perilously near to a sin if not actually one. Thus from the first, a moral difficulty comes to be intimately connected in a Catholic's mind with any intellectual difficulty affecting his faith. Hence, also, from the first a painful internal struggle is determined, and a conflict arises between the heart which still clings loyally to a system full of sacred associations, and the intellect which obeys laws of its own, and will not be silenced.

The Church's Theory of a Supernatural Act of Faith.

To strengthen the Church's position, Catholic theology has devised a theory of the act of faith which is, we may say, an act of faith in itself, as it makes the transition from the fact of ordinary natural evidence to an act of so-called supernatural faith an unintelligible psychical phenomenon. Common sense tells us that our moral certainty in all highly complex questions, such as facts of history or matters of scholarship is always something relative, something therefore to which our assent, to be reasonable, should bear some relative proportion. But the assent in a genuine Catholic act of faith, the assent even on the part of young and uneducated people who have no opportunity to inquire for themselves, but practically depend on what persons worthy of credit in their eyes, their parents, a pious teacher, or their parish priest have told them, the assent must be something not relative but absolute, not temporary but final, something transcending the powers of the natural faculties. Once the act of faith, in a moment of fervour, under a sense of human trust has been made, it is never lawful at any future time to place oneself intellectually where one was before one made it, and this is the case whether the person concerned be called John Henry Newman, or whether that person be simply Mary Ann, the innocent little girl who made her first communion yesterday.

Of course, theologians do not pretend that so grave a situation is brought about by a purely natural process. The process is said to be altogether governed by the grace of God who, at the right moment, raises man's faculty of belief and man's affections to a level which the carnally-minded can never reach.

Moral as well as Intellectual Conflict.

Hence the moral difficulty, according to Catholic theology, in attempting to go back by our own efforts upon a road over which we had previously travelled under the supernatural guidance of the divine spirit. Yet the fact remains that what had been sufficient evidence to us at a certain moment, under certain circumstances of our lives, of which we may not even have now a distinct recollection, at a stage of education when things seemed very simple, which to-day appear to us very complex; the fact, I say, remains that what had been sufficient evidence (as evidence goes in such things) may not be sufficient to us now, and that the insufficiency may be such that it compels us to recognise the change, even though we internally protest all the time that we mean no disloyalty and no sin.

The Age of Easier Faith.

But is there any fatal necessity why such a conflict should arise? Why cannot a quiet, humble, prayerful spirit remain satisfied that, in spite of any appearances, all is right, since the Church says so? Undoubtedly there have been times when such an assurance brought to one invaluable comfort; to accept it was the most reasonable thing to do. What was there, for instance, in the knowledge of his time that could have shaken seriously the sublime trust of a Thomas A'Kempis? There was no geology, no paleontology to disturb his serene reading of the Book of Genesis; there was no physical science, such as we have to-day, to interfere with his edification at the frequent reports of miraculous occurrences, of exorcisms and of the pious visitations of ecclesiastical tribunals upon the sin of witchcraft. No serious physiological knowledge raised any questions about the decisions of councils on matters affecting body and soul, and astronomy still allowed the devout Christian to read without misgivings of Joshua stopping the sun; the earth itself was said to be immobile at the centre of the universe, and what was there, apparently at least, as men watched the progress of the day, from Mattins to Vespers, to disturb such a teaching?

History, as we understand it in these days, did not exist; the verification of facts was, for the most part, impossible, and a real sense of historical evidence had not yet been awakened; men could read the Old and the New Testament, unconscious of the many difficulties which scholars to-day experience and cannot overlook. An ingenious system of allegory enabled them to turn even the most comminatory passages of the Psalms into subjects of profound edification, and a sincere belief in a plurality of meanings in Holy Scripture rendered easy and convincing many passages in which to-day we look in vain for the true word of prophecy.

Modern Knowledge compels to Doubt.

Thus, it cannot be seriously asserted that we stand at present where our forefathers stood; that our modern difficulties are simply of our own making and should be stoutly repelled by a fervent act of faith. We are told that to listen to the protests of our intellect involves moral defection, but in our turn we may ask: What is the moral value of a principle of faith which drives the young, the uneducated, the half-educated into a position before they have had time or opportunity to realise intellectually all it implies, and then forbids, under the most terrible spiritual penalties, any subsequent consideration of that position in the light of wider knowledge. The doctrine of infallibility may logically require such an attitude on the part of the Church, but we believe that that attitude will prove more and more damaging as time goes on to any ecclesiastical system condemned to it by its past.

Compromise Forbidden.

Is there, we asked, any fatal necessity

* A Paper read at Essex Hall on Thursday, May 28, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

why such a conflict should arise in anyone who is brought by his opportunities face to face with the facts of modern science and scholarship? We believe that conflict to be indeed inevitable; and we say: to avoid that conflict by any silent compromise, by dissimulation, by verbal subterfuges, or from any motive of policy, that is where the moral question comes in and not otherwise.

Special Points of Attack, and their Chief Defect.

Some people make a great deal of the minor defects of the Catholic system; they attack points of detail; they delight in exposing the dangers of the confessional, the superstitions of the worship, the exaggerations of Mariolatry, the illusions of Lourdes and the intrigues of the Jesuits. But such attacks are not directed against the Church's weakest points. In fact, they rather serve her interests by attracting attention to matters about which she can easily defend herself, and show that many such attacks are often unjust, and rest on unworthy calumnies. Catholics can easily show that, however idolatrous some of their doctrines may appear to outsiders, yet they mean no idolatry; their veneration of the Mother of Jesus, in some of its aspects at least, is after all an homage rendered to our Humanity; the practice of confession has its dangers, but it has also its consolations, and while it has certainly proved a curse to some, it probably has brought mental relief to many; Lourdes has its illusions, to be sure, but who will find courage to laugh at the sincere faith, the humble trust, the pious hope of poor sufferers who turn to God when human means have failed them? And as to the Jesuits—how simple must be those who imagine that, in that vast Church, Jesuitical characteristics are confined to the Society of Jesus. There must be things about that Order which the Church herself distrusted, since she once suppressed it; but this should not prevent us from doing justice to the industry, the apostolic zeal, the eminent virtues of many individual members of that famous society. It has produced great men, and it is perhaps mainly due to the special characteristics of the system if some of them have not been even greater. Thus, all those criticisms on secondary matters of doctrine or government fail to touch the really vulnerable point in the armour of the old Church—namely, her theory of a Divine Revelation through a divinely appointed Church.

That Revelation is said to be contained in certain written documents and in a tradition.

The Fatal Theory of Revelation through an Infallible Church.

Now, modern historical methods are daily revealing to us the human, the often very human, character of that ecclesiastical tradition, but they have practically done nothing to demonstrate its divine origin. Moreover, the new science of the comparative history of religions is making it daily more clear that what had been supposed to be special, to be unique in the dogmatic system of the Church, is in reality common, under many varieties of type and form, to most of the world's religions. The idea of an incarnation, and the theory of a sacrifice are well-known examples of those common elements.

On the other hand, modern biblical scholarship has dealt no less severely with the views gradually elaborated by the Catholic Church concerning the origin, authorship, verbal inspiration and infallibility of the sacred books of which that Church claims to have, by divine appointment, the exclusive keeping. Here science has joined with history and criticism in raising difficulties which could not have been foreseen when the Fathers of the Council of Trent so confidently promulgated their decrees upon the Holy Scriptures. Other Christian Churches, untrammelled by infallible definitions, may still adapt their teaching to the requirements created by later knowledge; their chief need seems to be that reasonable time be allowed them. But the position of the "infallible" Church is a far more difficult one, and those who are familiar with the present state of the question, will probably agree with me that the traditional view of Revelation, with all that it implies, as necessarily upheld to-day by the Roman Church, constitutes her main difficulty and her chief danger.

From the preceding remarks you will have easily gathered how I was led, not without much anxiety and pain, to the position which I now occupy. But I ought, perhaps, to add a few words to explain how, from my point of view at least, this position among Unitarians may appear natural and even logical.

Radical Criticism Essential.

The "type of religious experience" with which I have been made painfully familiar, has at least this advantage—it makes it almost impossible for one to face in a superficial or half-hearted manner the great problems which that religious experience raises. A man who has had to deal, for instance, with the definite, uncompromising view of a Revelation which the Roman Church teaches, is not likely to remain satisfied with the weak, hesitating, equivocal orthodoxy of most Protestant Churches at the present day; their attitude only too obviously betrays a perplexity strangely out of harmony with orthodox pretensions. I said a few moments ago, that some Protestant controversialists often made too much of secondary questions of doctrine and government in the Church of Rome, and too little of her really weak points. But those experienced controversialists, no doubt, have very good reasons for thus selecting their places of attack. If they were to approach the real difficulties they would, in most cases, be attacking what they are, in their own denominations, bound to defend, at least in a mitigated form. But I must not insist upon this aspect of my subject, since it properly belongs to the writers of the other papers in this series.

With Unitarians in Free Churches.

As to your Free Churches, commonly known as Unitarian, they represent something far more valuable and sacred than a mere denominational organisation. They represent the principle of reverent freedom in religious thought—that is the only principle with which we can approach to-day, with full honesty of mind and heart, the solemn religious problems raised by our present knowledge. To those who have not lost faith in the vitality of these problems, although they can no longer trust the old solutions bequeathed by the past, your Free Churches stand as a harbour of refuge, and the kindly Unitarian spirit makes those churches to them a natural home. Here, in an atmosphere of genial fellowship and true Christian tolerance, men may pursue the inquiries begun in days of storm and stress, knowing with assurance that they will be judged faithful if only they are true to themselves and to their clearest light. Elsewhere one might have been expected to defend certain foregone conclusions, and to serve, before all things, certain denominational interests; here loyalty to Truth and Freedom is the only accepted form of loyalty.

The New Ideal.

Here, above the narrow concept of a Church among the Churches, there seems to arise the glorious vision of a brotherhood consciously labouring to lay the foundations of a religion of humanity in a world progressively transformed by the Christian principle of love.

In this sense "from Roman Catholic to Unitarian" means much more than a record of individual experience; it means taking a share, however humble, in the highest work which any man can be called to do among men.

LITERATURE.

RICHELIEU.*

Is Richelieu also among the Heroes? Perhaps the exigencies of the series required it, and no doubt nations which so unaccountably love their rods of iron would be slow to deny the title to such as he. La Bruyère in attempting to define heroes was able to make a distinction which placed Alexander the Great amongst the "heroes," and Julius Cæsar amongst the "great men." Another classification is surely needed in order to comprise such men as Richelieu the Iron Cardinal, Napoleon the Iron Commander, and Bismarck the Iron Chancellor. The ferruginous species of statesmen have not unaptly been described as unmoral. They do not readily fall into any known category of morals, and are much better understood as "forces" than as "characters." Some slight trace at least of a "moral sense" seems indispensable to a notion of a hero. Cardinal Richelieu had no moral sense. No one ever did or could love him, but all stood in awe of him, and he manifestly enjoyed the sensation of being dreaded. The only man he ever feared was a man of character and high spiritual sense. He feared a man whom he could not buy. Such a man (an isolated instance) he met in St. Cyran, the Jansenist. He kept him immured in the gloomy dungeon of Vincennes, and when asked by the Prince of Condé to pardon him, replied, "Do you know of whom you speak? He is more dangerous than six armies." "Many troubles and misfortunes," he said "would have been avoided if they had ordered the arrest of Luther and Calvin when they began to dogmatise." Men of this strange type exert a stifling spell over their contemporaries, and afford a subject of fascinated interest to posterity. There are moods in which mankind morbidly "loves" an inscrutable, implacable, inexorable person. He is an exhaustless source for things dramatic, or rather melodramatic. The Cardinal had a strong taste for the stage and certainly the stage has had a strong taste for him. He loved splendid surroundings, and thirsted not only for power but for its trappings and external pomp. "Sitting in his palace" (the regal Palais Cardinal, later the Palais Royal) "in princely state, clothed in the red robes of his office, he was an imposing spectacle, and such he loved to be." The grim humour of the populace is seen in a contemporary print representing the Cardinal (broken in health) in his robes fondling his cats, and giving orders to the gruesome headsman at his side for the executions of his enemies. It was a legend, no doubt, but with ample justification for its creation. The axe fell so often on persons of high degree that when Marshal Saint Geran was on his death-bed in 1632 he said to those around him: "They will not recognise me in the other world, for it is a long time since a marshal of France has gone there with a head on his shoulders." We are not surprised to read that the Cardinal sometimes beat his servants. Still less are we surprised to find that when he was angry he swore with much vehemence. Lenet relates, referring to Richelieu's quarrels with the young Duke of Enghien, who had married his niece, Mlle. de Brézé, "I have learned from those who were witnesses of his anger, that the great man lost all control of himself and swore so terribly that they were filled with horror." He swore, in fact, like a trooper. "The Cardinal found more enjoyment in the pursuit of arms than in saying mass, and he was always pleased to pose as a soldier instead of a priest." He is described on one occasion as "equipped in a cuirass and full military dress, with a white plume floating from his hat, a sword by his side, and two pistols resting at the pommel of his saddle, and in this warlike attire he rode at the head of his forces on a spirited steed, showing manifest pleasure in exhibiting his skill as a horseman." He lived in an atmosphere of intrigue from the day that he undertook to become the Bishop of Luçon to please his mother, to restore the family affairs, and to be a readier means and a subtler to his boundless ambition. His rise to power, especially to the secure step of the Cardinalate is exactly in keeping with the type of man we hold him to be. Obsequious and even fawning before he attains his assured position; imperious, arrogant, cruel in prosperity; in adversity indomitable, discouraged by no disaster, and carrying on the combat with grim and merciless tenacity. Such a man never rests till he knows that "one only master grasps the whole domain." The maintaining of that strenuous, icy, loveless, if splendid isolation, is achieved by a system and a method that has always fascinated men and not too much scandalised them. "L'intrigue est toujours l'intrigue," said Hoche, and Cardinal Richelieu was, perhaps, the most consummate master of the art.

His system of espionage endowed him with an unearthly and almost infernal attribute of omniscience. He was a more infallible detective of crime than even Sherlock Holmes, inasmuch as he had paid and sleepless eyes in every place. He did not need to track crime by flawless steps of logic to its inmost cell. His Argus eyes saw its very genesis. At the psychological and fittingly melodramatic moment he stood ready with the two-handed engine at the door to smite once and smite no more; and the confiscated estates filled his prodigal and insatiable coffers. He simulated the rage of a man taken by surprise by conspirators. He was never taken by surprise. He was to the king whom he overawed with his majestic presence, as his very shadow. Eternal vigilance was the price of his eminence and his preeminence. Even the secret door was not a myth, and the Queen-Mother's reviving influence with Louis XIII. was nipped by a phantom-like appearance of the ubiquitous Cardinal on the scene of the private conference. The cross currents of intrigue and his hair-breadth escapes afford highly sensational reading, in spite of the even, sober, historical course of events as duly recorded by the impartial historian. It is not surprising to find that at the end of the eighteen years of the rule of this one man the whole country felt a sense of relief. "Bonfires blazed in many places when the news arrived that the iron Cardinal was no more." "The King was relieved when the overshadowing presence had passed away." "If there be a God," said Pope Urban VIII., "he will have to suffer; but if not, he has done well." As a judgment this is the quintessence of urbanity, but also how luminous. "'His assurance appals me,' said a bishop, as he marked the perfect confidence with which the Cardinal approached death." The author attributes it to a conscience at ease from a conviction of the justice of his policy. He knew that he was right; that he had acted for the true interests of Church and State. The same effect would follow equally well from quite another cause. The total absence of a conscience in a man begets the kind of assurance that appalled the bishop. The first French journal, the Gazette, nominally edited by Renaudot, but really by the Cardinal and sub-edited by the King, once again did its duty. It recorded the ten thousand candles that blazed in Notre Dame about the catafalque, and the oration in which no blazing indiscretions found a place. "Though for twenty years," says the Gazette, "the most polished writers seemed to have exhausted the praises of the deceased, yet the funeral oration was enriched by new thoughts, and gave general satisfaction." These were the halcyon days when men enjoyed the luxury of not reading newspapers. And that was not odd, for there was none, or only one, to read. And this one did its duty, or otherwise Renaudot would have been deprived of his pension. "Events agreeable to the administration had prompt attention, defeats and disasters received slow and scanty notice." "The punishment of those who ventured to criticise the Government was severe. Death was often prescribed for such offences; it was rarely inflicted, but long imprisonment was an ordinary penalty. . . . . Hostile criticism was forbidden, and absolute silence on political questions was preferred." Nous avons changé tout cela! We have said that Richelieu was a great force. The purpose of his existence was clearly outlined for himself; his policy was absolutely consistent. If he achieved his herculean political task, he would also have crowned his personal ambition to enjoy absolute power, boundless wealth, glory and fame. Here in his own words was the task he set his mind and hand to: "When your Majesty called me to your councils, I can truly say that the Huguenots divided the State with you; the nobles conducted themselves as if they were not subjects, and the governors of provinces as if they were independent sovereigns. Foreign alliances were despised, private interests preferred to public, and the dignity of your Majesty so abased it could hardly be recognised. I promised your Majesty to use all my industry and power to ruin the Huguenot party, lower the pride of the nobles, lead all subjects to their duty, and restore the country's name among foreign nations." "He could justly claim," says the writer of this book, "that his promise was fully executed." There is no word in the historian's vocabulary that so readily wakes our suspicion as the word "glory." This book is just a little too glory-spangled, though not a single aspect of the black lines of the picture is omitted. "If the Cardinal's administration was full of glory, it was not productive of happiness." "The mass of the people saw only heavy taxation, long and wearisome wars, and his own enormous wealth as the results of his administration."

They looked back with a deepening sigh to the days of the fowl in every peasant's pot, and of the armyless, navyless parochial King Henry IV. The contemporary mob would gladly have torn the Cardinal's remains from the tomb and scattered them to the winds. That act was accomplished during the French Revolution just a little over a century later. The starving class is a long-suffering class. He held all the great offices of State and drew their emoluments. He was a leviathan of pluralists. He trafficked in bishoprics and cardinals. He did not accept all the prodigal gifts the King offered him, but most of them. Our author says he was not corrupt, but prodigal. The results seem to be equally felicitous. "I fear," said an orator of the States-General in 1614—which proved to be the last, and at which Richelieu (as Bishop of Luçon) made his début—"I fear that these excessive burdens and the oppression from which the people suffer will drive them to despair." Under Richelieu the burdens, says the author, were heavier than before, and it was despair which drove an ignorant peasantry into hopeless rebellion. The next States-General met in 1789, and immediately became the National Assembly. Nemesis at last began to intervene, and through the mouth of one of her first prophets, Siéyès, asked, on behalf of the starving classes, the ominous questions: "Qu'est-ce que le tiers Etat? Tout. Qu'a-t-il été jusqu'à présent? Rien. Que demande-t-il? A devenir quelque chose." Richelieu's ideal was a submissive people ruled by an absolute monarch. Nothing is more dangerous, he said, than to pay attention to popular clamour. He would have been as much appalled by the prospect of universal education as by the prospect of universal suffrage. Even at a time when the great majority remained in total ignorance, Richelieu considered that too many people had their children educated. He thought it impossible to fit the people for self-government. It was a happy thought. And this was like unto it, that poverty would leave the people no time for dreams of political power. If the people were too much at their ease, they could not be kept in the path of duty. This happy thought also appears in his recorded meditations. And this also, that the people having less intelligence than the more educated orders, they can be restrained only by necessity. Like mules accustomed to burdens, they are more injured by long rest than by moderate labour. "There was little danger," says the author, "of the French peasant forgetting obedience because the burden of taxation was removed; it was oppressive under Louis XIII., and grew no lighter under his successors." We thank Dr. Perkins for this and other similar timely mercies. He forgives the Cardinal so much, and writes him up—a hero.

Dr. Perkins has done his work far too well for us to wish to carp at anything. The delicate and all-pervading vein of light sarcasm and epigrammatic badinage reconciles us to his admiration for his subject, and almost persuades us "to love the Cardinal." Nevertheless, we do object to the "clerk"ly style that tolerates the expression, "Louis himself wrote the Cardinal," "Louis XIII. writes his minister," "he wrote him." Moreover, we think that the expression "out of a job" is out of place even in a popular book. "French blood and money had flown freely" is probably a misprint, as the date 1718 on page 64 is for 1618. "A Seraphim" is a singular singular, though perhaps there is some classical warrant for it. A little knowledge of Hebrew is a dangerous thing, for us we mean. We have made concessions to Transatlantic orthography. We draw the line at syntax. We have not welcomed but put up with American travelers; for the sake of peace we have put up with honor; and even make allowances for an eccentric center. We magnanimously gave them Independence and they have taken liberties with the parts of speech. The old adage "Give a man an inch and he will take an ell" is new writ o'er in the form "Give the Americans Independence and they will take an 'l' out of our travellers, tamper with our honour, and alter the very centre of things." Well, a people who could do such things richly deserved their Independence. We prefer the Mother. O filia pulchra mater pulchrior. E. L. H. THOMAS.

MOODS AND OUTDOOR VERSES.*

THIS is a small volume of poetry by a new author. In accordance with the title the poems touch on many subjects, and they are of varying degrees of excellence and finish. But throughout the whole collection runs that vein of individuality which constitutes the claim of any new voice to a hearing. The author looks at life with his own eyes; he evidently studies it not only from books, but in the world of men and nature, and in each case he aims straight for the heart of his subject.

The poems suggest a sense in their author of the sturdy vitality existent in the universe—a vitality implying almost the conscious participation of all created things in the joy of their creation. In "Partnership," a short poem instinct with this sense—

> The pear tree thinks a thought divine
> And reads the mind of God;
> She understands how to combine
> The sunlight and the sod.

The Californian gum trees and the March wind that sways their tall tops are possessed alike with

> The irresistible mirth that brightens the face of day.

He shows also a considerable power of condensing the gist of his subject into its central thought, and of putting it forth in a few telling verses, even as an artist may produce a speaking likeness with a few bold strokes of the pencil. In "Cellini's Prayer" the whole life-purpose of the zealous, passionate, choleric artist is gathered into the bold challenge to his Maker to carry out His share of the enterprise, and enable the man He has made

> To prove what's manhood in the splendid span
> Of Your broad day; to front the mysteries
> As one who is a master, and to seize > Boldly what craftsman's instrument he can,
> And chip and carve a corner of the plan
> Marked in the marble of our destinies.

In "Giordano Bruno," again, the key-note of the man's nature—the compulsion to stand for truth at all cost, to hold liberty of soul dearer than liberty of body—is struck in his welcome to the "Spirit of Fire" as the messenger of freedom rather than as the crown of martyrdom—

> Yours are the spiritual wings
> Whereon must ride the soul that sings,
> Music the body may not bear,
> And hears what only spirits dare.
> Leap up, ye flames! bite out your smart,
> And loose me to creation's heart.

The delicate pathos of "An Ancient Dialogue" will appeal to all to whom Assisi's sunny-hearted saint is dear. It is, perhaps, the most charming poem in the collection. "Russia," "The Little People," "A Testament," touch on some of the deeper problems of life, and "Flowers" voices that heart-felt desire of us all—however diversely it may seek expression—for something beyond the mere "daily bread" of life.

> Flowers for the heart, and for the body meat—
> Feasting that either lacks is incomplete;
> Needs must the world have bread, but, oh, beside > Give me the poppies growing with the wheat.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

THE statement I made last week that the local education authority under the Bill would be restricted in their choice of persons to act as managers of voluntary schools by the provision of trusts which confine the management to "members of the Established Church," appears to be open to question. I find that it is the opinion of some members of the legal profession and county councillors with whom I have conversed that the Act (if it ever becomes an Act) will over-ride the trusts; others think that perhaps the term "additional managers" will put them on a different status from the managers appointed under the trusts; while others are of opinion that to give the local education authority entire liberty of choice special provision will have to be made in the Bill. This is another illustration of the obscurity which pervades the Bill throughout, and the uncertainty as to what may or may not be done under it.

The first act of the Education drama in Committee came to an end on Tuesday 17th inst. when Clause I. was carried with the application of the closure, many members of the House who wished to speak being thus shut out of the debate. Opinion was divided over the question of area, and the desirability or otherwise of reducing the number of borough and urban districts into which, for the purposes of education, the counties shall be divided. It was also pointed out that boroughs and urban districts with a certain number of inhabitants would be authorities for primary education, but that secondary education would remain in the hands of the County Councils. An amendment moved by Sir E. Grey, which would have done something towards remedying this anomaly, was rejected, but it drew from Mr. Balfour the explanation that the "one authority," of which so much has been heard, only applied to the power of raising a rate; and the still more remarkable admission that what was aimed at "was to get rid of the ad hoc business." Thus the confessed aim of the Bill is to hand over the administration of education to persons elected for other purposes, and to secure that, whatever control may be set up over voluntary schools, it shall not be a direct control by the ratepayers.

On the motion that Clause I. stand part of the Bill, Mr. Channing moved a direct negative, objecting to the revolutionary transfer of the control of education from the School Boards to the County Councils. He was supported by Sir William Harcourt, who, in a speech of some length, made some forcible remarks, but so far we can scarcely say that the opposition has come up to our expectations; the great fight, however, has yet to come over other clauses. It is scarcely possible to say anything about the first clause without anticipating, and so Sir William Harcourt was reminded that he would have future opportunities of bringing in amendments upon sections of the Bill with which he disagreed. This, however, did not weaken his attack upon the main object of the Bill, which is concealed under the broad proposal "that the Council of every county and of every county borough shall be the local education authority." This is only a round-about way of putting an end to School Boards, which again is only a means to a further end. A few years ago the Prime Minister recommended the clergy to capture the Board Schools. They have attempted this, but have failed, so the Government has come to their aid and brought in this Bill to abolish the Boards. As yet the curtain has only been partly lifted to show what the clergy hope to do with these schools in the future, but we must leave this point for the present. "The real object of the Bill," said Sir W. Harcourt, "was to remedy the failure of the voluntary system." It is sometimes asserted that the voluntary system has not failed because as good an education is given in voluntary schools as in Board schools, and in many cases this, no doubt, is true. But it has failed as a "voluntary" system because these schools are not supported by the "voluntaries who do not volunteer." The public are taxed for their support, and in some cases all that is left which can be called voluntary are the buildings and the management. Sir William put his finger on the right spot when he further said, "The School Board system has succeeded because it is under popular control, and the other system has failed because it is under private management." He also referred to the burden that would be thrown upon the county and borough councils as regards rating, educational control and religious controversy. The fact that a large number of councils have declared their dislike of the Bill as a whole or in part is significant. A few weeks ago we asked the mayor of a Liberal borough if he did not think they would be safe even if the Bill were made compulsory; he replied that he did not think so, as no pains would be spared to pack the council with opponents to the School Board system; and I have since learned that in that particular council there are Liberals (Churchmen and Roman Catholics) who upon this question would separate themselves from their party; so that not only in county council and municipal elections would the element of religious controversy be introduced for the first time, but it would penetrate into the council chamber itself, and gentlemen elected to look after roads and streets, lighting and drainage, would find themselves at variance over religious questions.

On the other side there is an element which has as yet not been sufficiently taken into account. In the Church itself this Bill is regarded as a sectional Bill, promoted and backed up by the High Church party, but I am assured that there is a "Protestant" party large enough to offer formidable opposition. I was present during the week at a meeting held to condemn the Bill, at which the chair was taken by a Churchman, the President of a branch of the Midland Education League, and who declared his uncompromising opposition to the Bill; and he said that though they were called the extreme Protestant wing, they had as much right to their say as the extreme ritualistic wing. He referred to the famous Gorham case to show that the question of baptism not only divided the Church from the Noncomformists, as Lord Hugh Cecil said, but that it was a ground of division in the Church itself.

As these concluding lines were being written, a telegraphic report arrived of Mr. Balfour's new financial proposals. They are intended in some measure to satisfy the demands of the agriculturists referred to in a previous article, but it is not to be anticipated that an additional grant from the Exchequer will modify the genuine opposition to the Bill; it is more likely to increase it, if it is unaccompanied by other concessions. It may be made an excuse for refusing to increase local control; and on the face of it it appears to be another plan for relieving the rural ratepayer at the expense of the urban taxpayer; but time is required for consideration before pronouncing a definite opinion upon the justice or the probable effect of this important proposal. THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

EVERYONE has been thinking and speaking a great deal this week about the coronation of the King and Queen. Perhaps some of you hoped to see the procession on the way to Westminster Abbey, or coming back after the service, at which the King sits in the old coronation chair, which was made in Edward I.'s time, and has been used ever since at coronations. While the King sits in that old chair the crown is placed on his head by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and then all the people who are in the crowded church shout "God save the King," and the trumpets sound, and by a signal given the great guns at the Tower fire a Royal salute.

But now the King's illness has put a stop to the Coronation and everyone is very anxious and disappointed. And so instead of saying more about the great celebration that was to have taken place, I will ask you to think over the history of our country, and remember the kings and queens that have ruled in England. Some of them ruled nobly, and some very badly, so that the right of the whole people to have a just rule in the land has been gradually asserted as stronger than any right of the King. It is the people, and not the King, who choose members of Parliament, and it is Parliament which makes the laws by which the land is governed. The people, through Parliament and what is called the Government, are the real rulers in England, and the King is only the chief person, to represent the country before the world, and to serve the people as lawful head of the State.

So we have to remember how all the people when they grow up, and have votes in this country, have to be earnest and careful to do all they can to help, and to see that we have a wise and good Government; and we have all to care very much whether our King, who holds the highest place of honour in the State, is a wise and good man, and does all that he can to influence people for good and to help on all kinds of good work. That is a great deal more important than all the splendid doings of a coronation, the putting of a crown on his head, and the blowing of trumpets and firing of cannon in his honour.

I want you to read the verses, which are printed on the next page to this, about the King's father, and his mother, Queen Victoria, who showed us better than any one else, how a queen or a king must win the honour and love of a free people. And then think of the kings and queens who were before them, and which of them were great and good and can be really honoured. Perhaps you will think first of Alfred the Great, who though he was not ruler over all England will always be remembered as a true English king and the noblest there has yet been. And, perhaps, you will be interested to see whether you understand these lines from William Watson's Coronation Ode, and know which of the kings and queens he means. He is, of course, speaking to King Edward:—

The kings thy far forerunners; he that came
And smote us into greatness; he whose fame,
In dark armipotence and ivied pride,
Towers above Conway's pride,
And where Carnarvon ponders on the sea;
He, that adventurous name,
Who left at Agincourt the knightly head
Of France and all its charging plumes o'erthrown.

. . . . .

And she, a queen, but fashioned king-like, she
Before whose prows, before whose tempests, fled
Spain on the ruining night precipitately;
And that worn face, in camps and councils bred,
The guest who brought us law and liberty
Raised well-nigh from the dead;
Yea, she herself, in whose immediate stead
Thou standest, in the shadow of her soul.

These, whom he thinks of as our greatest rulers, he pictures coming silently to the Coronation, to remind the King of the greatness of the throne to which he has been called, and the great duties of his high station. The rest of the passage is printed on the next page, and it is worth thinking over.

A CORONATION SONG.

My Country, my Country,
Dear land that gave me birth,
In honour I hold thee
The fairest land on earth;
I love thee, I love thee,
I give my heart to thee;
I joy to think of what thou art—
But more what thou shalt be.

The fame of the fathers,
A thousand years and more,
Hath storied thy valleys
And hills, from shore to shore;
They loved thee, their Country,
They gave their life for thee;
Of such a famous Fatherland
What should the children be?

I crown thee, my Country,
With triumph and with tears;
How awful thy glory,
Thy majesty, appears!
In loyalty kneeling,
I pledge my faith to thee,
To thee, and to thy greater self—
The England that shall be.

THE CORONATION.

WE were prepared, in view of the coming Coronation, to publish THE INQUIRER on Wednesday this week, when on Tuesday the startling news of the KING'S serious illness and the consequent postponement of the Coronation was made known. The news will be received throughout the country with profound grief, and we can simply wait in grave anxiety for the issue.

In the meantime, in view of the uncertainty of all public arrangements, it seems on the whole best to adhere to the arrangement that has been made, and to publish this week's INQUIRER on Wednesday.

And it seems best also, to leave here unaltered the article we had written, before the news arrived, as a record of the thoughts with which we looked forward to the Coronation. Whether the KING is actually crowned or not, now or at some future time, can make no difference to his position in the State, or to the loyalty with which the people gather about him, in heartfelt wishes for his health, and for the prosperity of his reign.

THE present week is devoted to a great ceremonial. All that is great and splendid in the world's eyes throngs about one central point, and with many elaborate forms in the ancient Abbey Church Edward VII. is consecrated King. In all this we would fain hope that there may be no forgetfulness of our "crown'd Republic's crowning common-sense." Much of the ceremonial of the Coronation Service is doubtless as obsolete as the theology of the Litany which finds a place in it, when regarded in the light of the actual religious and national life of the people of England to-day, and one could have wished for some simpler and more truthful expression of the homage which this nation and the Empire gladly render to the King; but neither Court officials nor the Church, fast bound by tradition and ancient ecclesiastical assumptions, had liberty or imagination or spiritual insight sufficient for such a task, and we have to be content with the forms which belong to an age long since past, and look beneath them for the true sentiment of this great occasion.

The King, in the Coronation Service, takes a solemn oath, "to Govern the People of this United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the Dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on, and the respective Laws and Customs of the same," and in all his judgments, according to his power to "cause Law and Justice, in Mercy, to be executed;" and further, to the utmost of his power, to "maintain the Laws of God, the true Profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant Reformed Religion established by Law." This last clause the Church "as by law established" is welcome to, as also to the references which follow, to her Doctrine, Worship, and Discipline, and the rights and privileges of her Bishops and Clergy, for the King has no power to maintain these, except as the people will, and no true power of religion can be subject to any royal assent. But in this solemn oath we have to recognise that the King promises to govern according to Law, and to do all else only "to the utmost" of his power, and that power is strictly limited. Our Government is now by the People, for the People, at least in so far as they realise their duties and their power; the King's power, as ceremonial Head of the State, is not so much in Government as in an exalted personal influence, which may be, as it was with Queen VICTORIA, of revered and beloved memory, of inestimable benefit to her people, but may be—which GOD forbid!—of evil portent in the nation's life.

And, therefore, at the crowning of the King it is to the Man we look, with a great longing that in this concourse of the people, representatives of a greater unity of freedom-loving peoples, circling the earth, it may be the genuine worth of a true manhood that is most deeply felt to be essential in the Chief to the welfare of the whole. And surely at this time, with the thought of the eager homage of the people and the solemn service in the Abbey vividly before us, we do well to recall the memory of the noble father of our King:—

For where is he,
Who dares foreshadow for an only son
A lovelier life, a more unstained, than his?
Or how should England, dreaming of his sons,
Hope more for these than some inheritance
Of such a life, a heart, a mind as thine,
Thou noble father of her Kings to be,
Laborious for her people and her poor—
Voice in the rich dawn of an ampler day—
Far-sighted summoner of war and waste
To fruitful strifes and rivalries of peace—
Sweet nature gilded by the gracious gleam
Of letters, dear to Science, dear to Art,
Dear to thy land and ours, a Prince indeed,
Beyond all titles, and a household name,
Hereafter, through all times, Albert the Good.

If that is a memory now to be recalled, there is another, nearer still, of the Mother, who "wrought her people lasting good," whose exalted place our King has now inherited:—

Her Court was pure; her life serene;
God gave her peace; her land reposed;
A thousand claims to reverence closed
In her as Mother, Wife, and Queen;

And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet

By shaping some august decree,
Which kept her throne unshaken still,
Broad-based upon her people's will,
And compass'd by the inviolate sea.

If we look for some word of the present moment not unworthy to be repeated with these lines of TENNYSON'S, we may turn to WILLIAM WATSON'S Coronation Ode. Here is a fine restraint and splendid imagination, a noble utterance going to the heart of what is worthiest in this great national occasion.

The greatness of the Empire, manifest in gorgeous symbols during the present week, may well be a source of pride, yet not without awe, if only we dare be true to the greatness of our people's calling.

Time, and the ocean, and some fostering star,
In high cabal have made us what we are,
Who stretch one hand to Huron's bearded pines,
And one on Kashmir's snowy shoulder lay,
And round the streaming of whose raiment shines
The iris of the Australasian spray.
For waters have connived at our designs,
And winds have plotted with us—and behold,
Kingdom in kingdom, sway in oversway,
Dominion fold in fold.

The homage of this great Empire is rendered to the KING, and as the crown, which signifies so much, is placed upon his head, the greatest of his predecessors are recalled, WILLIAM and the first EDWARD, HENRY V., and ELIZABETH, and that other greater WILLIAM,

The guest who brought us law and liberty
Raised well-nigh from the dead;

and, lastly, the QUEEN herself, of whom our KING was born.

All these, O King, from their seclusion dread,
And guarded palace of eternity,
Mix in the pageant with phantasmal tread,
Hear the long waves of acclamation roll,
And with yet mightier silence marshal thee
To the awful throne thou hast inherited.

The Ode ends with a timely warning that we may not be blinded by any splendour of Empire to the conditions of all true greatness, with a plea that what has been noblest in our history may be made known to the whole people, and that we may not be heedless of the dangers or of the duties of our high estate. To resolute watchfulness and strenuous service our Empire is called.

Nor must she, like the others, yield up yet
The generous dreams! but rather live to be Saluted in the hearts of men as she
Of high and singular election, set
Benignant on the mitigated sea;
That greatly loving freedom loved to free,
And was herself the bridal and embrace
Of strength and conquering grace.

Thus the Coronation brings to us thoughts of a great past and of a world-wide dominion. The national celebration centres in the KING and in the gentle and gracious presence of his QUEEN; yet this crowning is but the emblem of a greater rule, in which a free people must learn to be master of their own destiny, ruling all baser elements by justice and good-will, finding the strength of Empire not in self-seeking or the tyranny of greed, but in the service of a noble beneficence and the integrity of an honourable manhood.

We would gladly recognise in our KING the noblest qualities of a true Englishman, wise and laborious for his people's good. We rejoice to think that his earnest purpose has had no small share in securing the generous peace from which we hope for lasting good to spring out of the ruins and the long misery of war. We must hope that the splendid celebrations of this week, bringing together public servants and leaders of men from every quarter of the globe, may result not in vain-glory, but a deepening of the sense of greatness in honourable service, of the solemn trust in the hands of our race, and may render firmer yet the bonds which unite the wide dominions of our KING, strong for justice and humanity, for freedom, and the growing brotherhood of man.

THE HERITAGE OF ENGLISHMEN.

No truly religious mind can estimate greatness merely by size. It is the nations which have made this fatal mistake, and have been smitten with the disease of earth-hunger, laying field to field, as it were, and adding barn to barn, that have had the rude awakenings throughout the page of history; and have heard the awful voice of human and divine Justice saying to them in the midst of their vain-glory, "Thou fool, this night is thy Soul required of thee." It may be questioned, indeed, whether, in the lives of nations or of individuals, that one is to be accounted highly fortunate who is born to great possessions. Some little peoples are virtuous, noble, and happy. Some great peoples have been gross, degraded, and withal discontented in the midst of their abundance.

We Englishmen are the rulers (I quote figures which were correct up to the closing years of the nineteenth century) of nearly a quarter of the area of the globe, of a space three times as large as the whole of Europe, and nearly a hundred times as large as the little United Kingdom in which we live. Our King has some 400,000,000 of subjects, a number far vaster than any of us can conceive, and each unit consisting of a living and aspiring human soul. That alone is a thought to strike us dumb, should we ever be tempted to glory in our greatness whilst forgetting the stupendous responsibilities which are now given to us to bear.

Then, further, we have what the countrymen of Hawkins, Blake, Rodney, Collingwood and Nelson specially pride themselves upon, I mean the Mastery of the Sea. Phœnicians, Greeks, Carthaginians, Romans, Spaniards—all these have been for a season "mistress of the seas." But their mastery has gone; and the free waves of ocean have sung their dirge. If we would retain our mastery we must not commit the same mistakes as they. As children of the sea we must love Freedom; we must have largeness of sympathy and love. It may be ours sometimes—which God forbid!—to thunder against a hostile shore. But our daily and hourly task must be to carry the glad tidings of friendship, brotherhood, and peaceful commerce to all lands alike; drawing the nations together by highways of mutual understanding and trust. The ocean is the great cleanser, purifier, bringer of refreshing tides and breezes. Let the ruler of the seas keep them free and unstained—himself as kindly, pure, and generous as they. We owe much to that little "silver streak" of water which has, for the most part, kept our island home inviolate, and spared us the sight of the ruined homes and devastated fields of war. Others have not been so fortunate, else might the course of history have been different. Let us, however, not be "insular" in our pride, our self-esteem, our self-reliance, but large and catholic in our temper as the ocean which bathes our shores.

Thirdly, we have the inheritance of our History. Fifteen hundred years of development since the Saxon Conquest, thirteen hundred since the coming of Augustine and his monks to Kent, one thousand since the glorious thirty years' rule of English Alfred! It is a splendid story of growth and progress, of which we may well be proud in the face of the world. What a fabric of law and unwritten custom these centuries have built up! Though in many respects the most conservative of people, we have taught the world the secret of representative institutions and Parliamentary Government. Our monarchy has been retained, and is strong to-day in the popular goodwill; and yet our forefathers have given despotism for all time the object lesson of the execution of Charles I., and the banishment of the Stuarts with their absurd claim to a "right divine" to govern wrongly. There have been many weak and foolish monarchs on the English throne; but the good sense and practical independence of the people have brought them safely through many an anxious peril. For a couple of generations now, the crown has wisely and tactfully allowed the government of the country to be "broad-based upon the people's will." So, too, though we have had some foolish and egotistical statesmen, and sometimes a selfish aristocracy, there are few nations which can show a nobler roll of patriot heroes than the framers of Magna Carta and the Bill of Rights; Hampden, Pym, Eliot, and Cromwell; Fox, Burke, and Pitt; Peel, Cobden, Bright, and Gladstone.

Until a generation ago, popular histories of England dealt with courts and monarchs, wars and alliances, soldiers and diplomatists. But John Richard Green was herald of a new and better time when he ignored the "drum and trumpet" method and pictured in his own glowing language, from ancient record, the wondrous History of the English People—their Poor, their Traders, their Religion, their Education, their Literature. That marked an epoch; and henceforth, when we look back upon the thousand year old story of our national life, we see God's hand in it, not in the fact alone that kings and conquests have remained to us through all these changes, but that a mighty people has thus been long maturing, sending out its branches over the sea, and learning, line by line, the hard lessons of liberty, progress, and self-control.

And this leads me to the fourth element, one of the noblest, in our heritage. I mean the deposit of Freedom which has come to us, and which has made proverbial the expression "a free-born Englishman." One finds something suggestive in the fact that a line of the popular national song declares that "Britons never shall be slaves." Let it not be thought that I am claiming more for our people, and more from our heritage, than I can find warrant for. I know there are economic and social slaveries in our midst to-day, giving the lie to our boasts. The few still enslave the many; the strong still enslave the weak, although the fetters are not made of iron, and although the victims run through the streets singing "Rule Britannia." Still, the clock of Freedom has struck more than once in our island story, and our record through the past gives us an assured confidence that it will strike yet again. The new slaveries will go down as the old have done if we are true to the spirit of our sires. Reaction and privilege may raise their hoary heads; but it is not to be thought that the flood of British Freedom is destined to be lost in bogs and sands.

In our halls is hung
Armoury of the invincible knights of old;
We must be free or die, who speak the tongue
That Shakespeare spake, the faith and morals hold Which Milton held.

When we cease to care for Freedom, for ourselves and also for others, then may we die indeed! Then, indeed, are we dead, for a new and baser race of Englishmen will have begun to stain the name of the old. Fifty years ago Emerson wrote of our people:—

The English have given importance to individuals, a principal end and fruit of every society. Every man is allowed and encouraged to be what he is, and is guarded in the indulgence of his whim. "Magna Carta," said Rushworth, "is such a fellow that he will have no sovereign." By this general activity, and by this sacredness of individuals, they have in 700 years evolved the principles of freedom. It is the land of patriots, martyrs, sages, and bards, and if the ocean out of which it emerged should wash it away it will be remembered as an island famous for immortal laws, for the announcements of original right which make the stone tables of Liberty.

Only a brief word can be added here of that portion of an Englishman's Heritage of which he speaks as English Literature.

Emerson speaks severely, in his "English Traits," of the utilitarianism of the English character. "They are" he says "with difficulty ideal." They have never reached, or approached again, he thinks, the heights attained in the Elizabethan age.

"The bias of Englishmen to practical skill has reacted on the national mind. They are incapable of an inutility, and respect the five mechanic powers even in their song. They are most conditioned men, as if, having the best conditions, they could not bring themselves to forfeit them. . . . The practical and comfortable oppress them with inexorable claims, and the smallest fraction of power remains for heroism and poetry. No poet dares murmur of beauty out of the precinct of his rhymes. No priest dares hint at a Providence which does not respect English utility. The island is a roaring volcano of fate, of material values, of tariffs, and laws of repression, glutted markets and low prices."

This will be somewhat of a new note to those who are accustomed to boast, with "that complacency which" our American friend tells us "never deserts a true-born Englishman"—of our glorious English literature, as though England were the natural home and haunt of the muses. A glorious literature we have indeed! many eminences, a few lofty peaks, one summit reaching far upward beyond his fellows into the sky. But the truth remains that there is too little of imagination and poetry in the English temperament to give cause for boasting; and, along with the few mountain peaks, there are vast areas of monotonous plain and heavy swamp.

I come, sixthly, to our national heritage of Religion, where much the same kind of criticism may be, and indeed has been offered. Luckily, a people's character is not quite the same thing as the religion it inherits. Each generation of people starts, in some degree, afresh; whilst nothing is more conservative and inelastic than the external forms of religious habit. An American coming over here and seeing the English reverence for the forms of episopacy, for the Church Service, for the old creeds and ritual and traditions, might almost think that we are ancestor worshippers.

But the religion of England is neither the Established Church nor any of the rival sects. Spite of the conservatism which clings to old forms which have lost nearly all meaning and truth, philanthropic effort, the lessening records of crime, and the nature of English home life prove that we still share an inheritance of piety and righteousness, however obscured by faults of temper, habit, and tradition. An eminently religious nation I think the English can not be called. But I believe they have learned from their forefathers to honour truth and purity of heart and life, justice and fair-dealing, courage and pity. Martyrs, saints, and prophets, our race too, has yielded. And though, sometimes here, as in other lands, the worship of Pleasure and of Mammon may appear to be gaining ground, we know there is good soil in English hearts for the seed of truth and brotherhood and love which shall yet be planted, to burst into a great and far-spreading tree. The public conscience is growing and strengthening. The errors of an antiquated theology and ecclesiasticism have not left us yet; but their power is waning, their time is short. The qualities of courage and truthfulness and sense of duty in which Englishmen have not been wanting in the past are not dead yet in English breasts; and trusting to the guidance of these, we shall believe that the future will find us, not more distant, but nearer to God and the knowledge of His truth and love. May the blessed dawn of Peace help us to realise and cherish better the riches of our "goodly heritage." H. S. PERRIS.

THE NEXT STEP IN THE EVOLUTION OF RELIGIOUS METHODS.

BY VLADIMIR TCHERTKOFF.*

Christian Inconsistency.

THE fact that the order of life of so-called Christian nations is in direct opposition to the faith they nominally profess is at present very generally acknowledged by most progressive reformers, and allusions to it have become a commonplace in their indictments of individual and social, economical, political, and international injustice.

This inconsistency of the professors of the Christian faith is often, and, I believe, correctly, attributed chiefly to the circumstance that the form of Christian teaching which has reached its present-day adherents does not present the pure, unambiguous, and radical life-conception of the original founder of this teaching; but is merely the distorted outcome of ages of misunderstanding and misrepresentation, which have deprived the teaching of its vitality and power.

Owing to this reason the centre of gravity of the teaching was transferred from its direct bearing on human conduct into the sphere of mystical dogmatism in which so much attention is directed to abstruse theology and the welfare of one's individual soul in a future life, that no sufficient energy remains for applying the standard put forward by Jesus to the practical problems of this present life.

Thus in the course of ages was developed and became crystallised that monstrous ecclesiastical superstition from which mankind is at present suffering either directly in the persons of those millions of human beings who are blinded by it, or else indirectly in the dogmatic materialism this deceit often engenders as a natural reaction.

Most of those here assembled, I believe, agree in recognising the fatal character of this calamity, and, as I have already had the occasion of mentioning at a previous meeting of this Society, one cannot but feel deeply thankful for the privilege of being allowed to associate with a body of religious thinkers whose eyes are open in this respect.

Knowing, as I also do, that the cause which unites us does not imbue us with any desire of flattering each other, or of extolling in a self-complacent spirit the intellectual advantages we enjoy, I make bold to infer that it will not be taken amiss if I candidly give vent to some doubts and misgivings which persistently pursue me in connection with the position which followers of liberal theology are sometimes apt to assume in relation to the practical social problems of our day.

Insufficiency of Theology.

Upon careful examination of the various so-called "progressive" movements of the present time, one becomes deeply convinced that almost all they represent of true and right is contained either explicitly or implicitly in the teaching of Jesus, as understood and expressed by himself, and that, on the other hand, those elements of these progressive movements which have not been forestalled, be it only in germ, by his amazingly exhaustive genius in the sphere of human relations, generally present precisely the weakest and most questionable points in the systems they are connected with.

If such be indeed the case, it were but natural to expect that those followers of Jesus who have had the good fortune to become emancipated from misleading theological accretions, and have thus gained free access to his teaching in its original purity, would be the first to recognise the iniquity of the present order of life and to sympathise with that great cause of radical reform in its various branches which the most advanced pioneers of thought and action are so nobly and strenuously fighting for, whilst often painfully suffering from the lack of necessary support and encouragement. And yet most of us will, I am afraid, agree that, as a matter of fact, such is not the attitude which necessarily follows from a liberal standpoint in theology. With reluctance and shame we are compelled to acknowledge that minute study of questions connected with the Infinite does not always carry with it an equal interest in the establishment of right relations amongst men, but often alone satisfies the human mind, leaving untouched the springs of practical action on behalf of humanity. And thus it is we see, on the one hand, the cause of suffering and oppressed mankind, passionately espoused by those in love with humanity, but who—having no higher religious conception of life to overrule their methods of expediency—often with the best intentions wander from the right way; whilst, on the other hand, we have whole societies, although possessed of this higher religious understanding, yet lacking that intense sympathy for their suffering fellow-creatures which could alone urge them to move Heaven and earth for the promotion of a better condition of social life.

New Possibilities.

This is as yet not as it should be; but I firmly believe that it is so only as yet. One can already discern the approaching dawn illuminating the salient minds in various religious groups, and many an earnest soul is beginning to feel both a painful uneasiness at the present state of things and a hopeful presentiment of new developments approaching. This advent of a fresh wave of energy directed towards new possibilities is undoubtedly sought for and deeply desired by many; and the very titles of the addresses which are this evening being delivered in this hall are certainly of good omen as a confirmation of the fact.

At periods such as this it is more than ever the duty of every sincere man to speak out candidly what is in his mind and heart without fear of shocking those who may disagree with him. If anything he expresses be right, it may perhaps be of some use to others; if what he says is wrong, others may help to correct him. It is therefore in this spirit of fraternal intercourse I beg permission to allude to some of the features of current religious methods which, as it appears to me, tend towards the obstruction of our spiritual progress, representing merely the outlived survivals of a narrow and mystical theology we have abandoned—features which, if they be indeed of this character, are doomed to disappear in the course of our further religious evolution, it being at the same time the duty of those of us who perceive their fallacy to endeavour to hasten their elimination. My remarks will necessarily have to be brief and unsystematic, the few minutes at my disposal only admitting of one or two cursory and tentative suggestions.

* An Address given at Essex Hall on Wednesday Evening, May 21, in connection with the Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Church Limitations.

One great disadvantage we should, I think, be careful to avoid, is that of binding oneself down as a member of any particular religious denomination. For special practical purposes the organisation of societies or associations may certainly be of great use, but to fix the character or scope of one's religious understanding by regarding oneself as belonging to a definite church, even though it have no formulated creed, is to place unnecessary limitations in the way of one's own spiritual development, as well as to emphasise precisely those very barriers between oneself and people of another mental attitude which it is especially desirable to overcome. Participating in a Unitarian meeting on the present occasion one's thoughts are naturally directed to such men as Channing, who admitted he was "little of a Unitarian;" Parker who preferred exclusion from the society of his fellow-churchmen to submission to the restrictions they desired to impose upon him; Emerson, who gave up the ministry because of the sacramentalism it involved; Martineau, who felt he could never be a member of a Unitarian church; and I cannot help feeling they were right. In this connection I should like to cite a few lines of Tolstoy's in answer to a group of English adherents of his who desired his approval of a society they had founded and called "Tolstoyan." In his letter to them he wrote: "I have always held the opinion—and it cannot change—that to be a member of the old society started by God at the beginning of conscious humanity is more profitable for oneself and for mankind than to be a member of the limited Societies which we organise for the sake of attaining the ends we are able to conceive. I think the preference we give to our own Societies is due to the fact that the part we play in them appears to us of much greater importance than the one we play in God's Great Society; I own there are some advantages in the union of persons of the same mind into Societies; but the drawbacks of such organisations are, I think, much greater than their advantages. And so I feel that for myself it would be a great loss to change my membership of God's Great Society for the most seemingly useful participation in human Society. As I myself desire to be free from all trammels and all exclusiveness in order that nothing should distract me from direct immediate communion with God, so also I should desire the same for my friends near to me in spirit."

Ministers and Congregations.

Another important mistake into which, as it appears to me, religious groups are so apt to fall is their fatal tendency to split into two sections—those who teach and those why are taught—thus forming the familiar combination of ministers and their congregations. "The Spirit breatheth where it listeth." The human soul is so constituted that one and the same individual alternately becomes expounder or recipient of the Truth; and to endeavour to artificially regulate these two capacities by entrusting certain men with the pre-eminent function of teaching, while others intentionally conserve a passively receptive attitude, is to violate the natural laws of spiritual psychology, and to inflict serious injury on both sides. I will again quote a few words from Tolstoy, hastening, however, to add that, if I do so, it is not at all because I regard Tolstoy as an authority, or wish to impose his views upon others, but merely because I feel it undesirable to go out of my way in order to formulate in my own words what I wish to convey, when it has already been expressed by another better than I could. In a private letter to a pastor Tolstoy says: "I do not agree with the idea of the necessity of a church, and therefore of ministers. I cannot forget the injunction 'Be not ye called teachers, for one is your teacher, and ye are all brethren'—not because these words are from the Gospel, but because it is for me a perfectly evident truth that there cannot be any ministers, teachers and guides amongst Christians, and that it is precisely this transgression of the Gospel Law which has hitherto almost completely nullified the meaning of the true Christian teaching. All that a man who wishes to follow the Christian teaching can do is to endeavour to perfect himself to the full measure of his strength, to use in this work of self-perfection all his powers, all his energy. This is the only method of influencing one's neighbours and of helping them on the way of righteousness. If a church does exist it is given to no one to know its limits, and no one can know whether he belongs to it or not. The most that a man can desire or hope is to strive to become a part of this church, but no one can be certain that he has indeed become a part, and even less can he imagine that he has the possibility and the right of guiding others."

Here Tolstoy alludes, of course, only to the practice of recognising and setting up certain individuals as authoritative or professional teachers of religion and guides of conduct. The possibility for men to teach each other on the merit alone of what they put forward, he naturally does not think of denying.

Prayer and Worship.

Then, again—the practice of public prayer in so remarkable an opposition to another injunction of Jesus, who recommended that each of us when praying should enter into his inner chamber, and, having shut his door, should pray to his father who is in secret. As strivers after rational religion who do not shun but solicit the light of reason in our spiritual experiences, we are, more than anyone, aware of the vital importance of constantly keeping awake our critical capacity, whereas the state of worshipful unction which public prayer necessarily engenders in those who follow it with due meekness and self-abasement precludes criticism and obliges them for the time being to unreservedly endorse the individual peculiarities of another man's conception of the divinity, thus assimilating new spiritual limitations, instead of gradually freeing themselves from their own. Whilst for the one who leads the prayer, the consciousness of addressing God in the presence of an audience—strenuously following each word and participating in each pause or hesitation—deprives his prayer of that character of privacy and spontaneity which constitutes its essential value.

And in general the whole tone and routine of so-called public worship seems so out of harmony with a truly liberal religion. In former times when worshippers believed in an anthropomorphic God—who could be propitiated by ritual and exhortation, and whose will was proclaimed by his representative from the pulpit—it might have been proper that the congregation should sit in receding rows, facing each other's backs, and with eyes turned towards one sanctified end of the building, from which the divine grace was expected to descend upon them. But in the present day, and especially for those who believe that every man has direct access to the Higher Power through his own inner consciousness, why not at our religious meetings sit all on an equal footing, facing each other, as becomes those who recognise every human being as a temple of God and possible channel for the transmission to others of His divine will, subject to the spiritual discernment of the recipients? And why, on these occasions, restrict the readings to one particular book which we have long ceased to regard as pre-eminently sacred, when the literature of all times and countries affords ample material of the most elevated and inspiring kind to supplement the Bible?

Unnecessary Barriers.

I have not the possibility of now entering into further details. But I think what I have already mentioned is sufficient to indicate in general outline the direction in which I believe the forthcoming evolution of religious methods is likely to pronounce itself. I am well aware that many, probably the majority of those here assembled, will not be in sympathy with my point of view. But I cannot help hoping that what I have expressed does, more or less, coincide with what some, at least, of those present feel and think. And if this were really the case it would be a great joy to me. As for those who disagree with me on this subject, I trust that, at all events, they will not condemn me for frankly speaking out, for I know, by past experience, that if this society invites persons from outside its ranks to address it, it is because it is, indeed, broad-minded enough to consider all sides of the questions it examines, and tolerant enough to listen to views sometimes in complete opposition to its own.

One objection to what I have endeavoured to put forward this evening I think I can already foresee—namely, that if you made away with, say, Unitarianism as a definite church, with its ministers, its public prayer and worship, then nothing worth speaking of would remain of it as a separate and independent movement. To this I would answer that the sense of "separateness" would certainly, to a great extent, disappear; but that this would be, in regard to the cause Unitarianism represents, not a loss, but a decided advantage. Unnecessary artificial barriers would be swept down which at present prevent many earnest representatives of liberal religion from assimilating themselves with this movement, incongruous, outlived sacerdotal forms serving to keep them at a distance; whereas, at the same time, Unitarians themselves, broken loose from these old-fashioned external limitations, would inevitably blend more unreservedly with many progressive currents, thus introducing into them a fresh religious element they are greatly in need of.

Obsolete Religious Methods.

We all, I think, agree that the fundamental, all-important element in the understanding of life we have the privilege of sharing is not that we belong to this or that organised body, whether it be called Unitarian or otherwise; but that our life-conception is a religious one, and moreover a rationally religious one. In other words, we recognise our relation not only to that which is included in time and space, but also and above all to the Infinite. We believe in a Higher Power, a Supreme Source of Life from which our consciousness emanates and to which it will return. We know that this Power, which we term God, has inculcated into us the sense of obligation or duty towards Itself, as represented in a moral law, which Jesus called the Will of our Father, and which we are bound to discover, study and follow to the best of our ability and power, guided by our spiritual intuition and our reason. The distinction between those who recognise this power and those who have not yet come to recognise it is that the latter are directed in their conduct by considerations of expediency, either individual or social, whereas the former have the advantage of accepting religious principle as their supreme standard, which should overrule all considerations not in accordance with it.

Religion—that purifying and vivifying, that sanctifying power, comprehensible only to those who have experienced its inspiration, is unfortunately so often wanting in some of the noblest progressive efforts of our time, rendering their realisation one-sided, incomplete and at times even of questionable value. It is therefore obviously the calling of those who recognise religion to introduce its beneficent influence into those spheres of human thought and activity where it is lacking. For us, followers of liberal religion, the elimination of those obsolete methods which are yet surviving by inertia cannot possibly destroy or in any way injure our religious capacity, but, on the contrary, would only intensify it by freeing it from artificial supports, and facilitating its further growth and development.

Universal Service.

We know that the true teaching of Jesus does not consist in that false theology the fallacy of which we have discovered; but we should also remember that neither does it consist in refutation of false theology, nor in any system of true theology, however clever and fine; it consists in a very definite attitude towards our fellow-men which involves most important and intensely practical issues in the conduct of our lives. If we have had the good fortune to disentangle ourselves from a network of theological errors this is yet only the first step which has enabled us to approach the teaching with an open mind. With the life and life-conception of Jesus as our standard, our place is in the very foremost ranks of all humanitarian progressive reform. If we are not yet there it is our sacred duty to make a genuine whole-hearted effort to reach that position, and if the fervour necessary for this purpose is absent from us, this can only be because, absorbed in the narrow interests of our own religious groups, we keep too much apart from those who, notwithstanding that they may be unacquainted with what we call religion, are working far in front of us.

The evolution in religious methods which I have alluded to would, I feel most deeply convinced, help religious thinkers and workers more successfully themselves to assimilate all that is good and right outside their particular circle, at the same time enabling the spiritual understanding which inspires them to permeate more freely the life around them, consolidating all the diversified progressive and humanitarian aspirations of our time into one harmonious, divine service, not formal or external, but actual and universal—and thus realising at last that worship of the Father which is "neither in this mountain nor in Jerusalem," but "in spirit and truth."

AT the annual meeting of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, held on Tuesday week in the First Presbyterian Church, Belfast, the Moderator, the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, B.A., opened his address with a reference to the universal thanksgiving for the restoration of peace, and then proceeded to speak of two questions of the hour in Ireland, that of university education and the land question.

As far as university or higher education was concerned, he saw no reason for increasing the present facilities which existed. He resisted with all the force he had at his control the idea that the Queen's College was a godless institution. He believed that the association together of young men of different persuasions in matters of religion would not alone be a benefit to themselves, but a national gain. It would teach them to know each other and to respect each other, and in that would bring them together closer in social and national life. One university with affiliated colleges in the four principal cities of Ireland was the ideal. There was no further need for another, which would be dominated by the clerical control of Maynooth. He insisted on undenominational education as the first principle of any attempt to regenerate Ireland. This question could not, however, stand alone. It was intimately connected with that of the land. He did not commit himself to any of the wild theories that had been of late pervading the atmosphere. He placed his position on the one impregnable rock—the land for the people. He would not be betrayed from that by any opposition, no matter from what quarter it came.

The Rev. J. A. Kelly was appointed Moderator for the coming year, this being his second appointment, at an interval of eighteen years.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the session took place at the College on Thursday and Friday, June 19th and 20th. Thursday was largely devoted to the reading of students' essays and examination answers, and sermons preached in the College Chapel by four of the leaving students, Messrs. C. L. Briggs, B.A., Gordon Cooper, B.A., F. H. Vaughan, B.A., and G. A. Ferguson. Six students in all have completed their college course, and are entering on ministerial appointments, as follows:—Mr. Ferguson, at Kirkcaldy; Mr. Briggs, to whom the Russell Martineau prize for Old Testament studies was awarded, as Missionary Fellow at one of the Liverpool Missions; Mr. Gordon Cooper, with the Rev. F. K. Freeston, at Essex Church, Kensington; Mr. A. H. Thomas, B.A., who gained first-class honours in Ecclesiastical History and New Testament, at Stourbridge; and Mr. Vaughan, at Hull; while Mr. E. E. Jenkins will take charge during the summer months of the Bell-street Mission, Marylebone. For the new session, which opens on Monday, Oct. 20th (the students returning on the previous Saturday) Mr. R. P. Farley, B.A., will be senior student. There will probably be twelve divinity students taking the full course, while as special students Mr. Z. Toyosaki, of Japan, and Mr. V. R. Shinde, B.A., of India, are to be joined by Mr. Petursson, a Scandinavian student, who has been at Meadville; and, if all goes well, at least nine external students will be working for graduation at Oxford colleges and elsewhere, prior to entering for the theological course.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

On Thursday afternoon, at 5 o'clock, the Visitor's Address to the students was given by Dr. CAIRD, the Master of Balliol, before a large audience in the Lecture-room.

The Address, which was understood to be substantially one of Dr. Caird's recent Gifford Lectures, and therefore destined shortly to be published in book-form, dealt with the bearing of Reflective Thought upon Religion. Whether such thought helped or hindered religious life, was a question, the lecturer said, eagerly discussed by the representatives of religion and of philosophy in the present day, and he proposed to define the relation between those two elements of life, and to suggest that if there was antagonism, it did not exclude reconciliation.

Man was religious before he sought to understand or criticise the validity of the religious consciousness, and theology was not religion, but rather the philosophy of religion. Early religion did not trouble about its own justification; there was vigorous life, but no endeavour to formulate its principles. They were a long way down the stream before they came to any book religion, and a long way further still before there was any attempt to liberate the religious idea from its imaginative dress, to define the object of worship or define His relation to Nature and man. Yet in the process of history the part played by reflection became more and more important. Though reflection could not originate new movements of religion it became more powerful to modify religious faith. The result of reflective criticism entered more deeply into religion itself.

Thus the later religion of the Jews, after the exile, under many influences of sympathy and antagonism, broadened to a great prophetic faith with universal sympathies and a wide outlook upon the world. It was fitted to encounter the reflective thought of Greece on its own ground, and to coalese with it in Alexandria into a new product. And Christianity springing from a Judaism already tinged with Greek thought, was from the first a reflective religion. In the New Testament there is not only religion, but, especially in Paul, the germs of a theology. It has never been a religion simply of faith. Anselm was right when he urged that it was not only allowable to advance from faith to reason, but that for the sake of religion it was necessary. That did not mean that a Christian must be a philosopher, but that a Christian could not in the long run maintain his faith unless he continually turned it into living thought, and realised what light it could throw on the nature of man and his relations to Nature and to God. It was impossible to sever action and feeling from thought, nor could thought exist without striving to systematise and justify itself as science. Living religion must make man as fearless in the intellectual as in the moral life.

Philosophy and reflective thought were often regarded as merely destructive of faith, and the return to blind faith was sometimes urged on the ground of the havoc intellect had wrought. But they might hope for a better reconciliation of the apparently conflicting elements in their nature, which would harmonise the religion of will and affection with complete loyalty to truth. In the idea of evolution they had an eirenicon. The presence of two factors or stages in one life did not prove that they were governed by two antagonistic principles, but in the process of development a higher unity arose. Though reason might be accidentally opposed to faith its ultimate action must restore whatever was valuable in the faith. There was no absolute opposition between the two. It was essential to faith to develop into reason, nor could criticism be merely negative. It would burn up what was perishable, but could not touch the foundation-stones of the building nor the eternal foundation on which it was built. It might be fatal to many things men had bound up with religious life, but would not destroy anything necessary to it. Christianity was not necessarily connected with imaginative symbols. It had its origin in an age of reflection, and lived and moved in an atmosphere of universality. It was a universal religion, built on the idea of the unity of man with God, and on the fundamental fact of the spiritual nature of the universe. Whatever might become of the special doctrines in which it found its first reflective expression there was a kernel of eternal truth that would remain.

THE VALEDICTORY SERVICE.

The Valedictory service for the six students leaving college to enter on the ministry, was held in the College Chapel, on Thursday evening. The devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. C. B. Upton, and Farewell on behalf of the College was given by the Principal, Dr. Drummond, and the Welcome into the Ministry by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, of Lewin's Mead, Bristol.

Dr. Drummond in his Valedictory address spoke of the treasures the students would carry with them to new scenes and changed conditions of work; the stores of knowledge they had gained, and even more valuable than these, sound methods of research and humility of judgment; the habits of study and orderly work; the love of truth and constant openness to the light. Whatever definite convictions they might have reached, that would be no check to free research. In that college they had differences of opinion, but no heresies; they did not choose what they would assert and defend, but suffered truth to choose them. It was a great and precious privilege to be enrolled in that service. Their part was to interpret the Spirit's voice in heart and conscience, to train the organ of judgment, and bring to each inquiry a full and Catholic mind. They must seek purity and simplicity of heart, where truth makes her abode and communicates the vision of God. It was the aim of the College to combine ancient piety with modern thought. That they must take also into their ministry, for it was an urgent need of the present day, to restore to harmony the intellectual and the spiritual side of human nature. The need for the reconstruction of theology was felt by well informed minds in many denominations. Unless they had failed in their endeavours, they had set before their students the true ideal of the enlightened theologian, with the devotion of the mystic, and with an apostolic zeal.

The Rev. A. N. Blatchford, in an address of brotherly and heartfelt welcome, urged that in a very real sense it was in self-consecration and self-sacrifice alone that they would find the true lever for their best and most effective work and service. Holding to that, no words could adequately express the inward joy, peace and strength that would sustain and glorify their life. Out of their own heart and conscience their satisfaction and success must arise. They must be sure of their hearts before God, and high courage would spring up in joyful audacity in full response to that trumpet-call of Emerson: "Trust thyself, and each heart shall vibrate to that iron string." They might often be as lonely outposts in the far advance; their testimony had still to be of the faithful, thoughtful, courageous few. And if so, blessed would they be in their life and labour, like their Master, and their toil could not be in vain. They must keep the image of his self-forgetfulness ever before them; their all-sufficient guide would be the spirit of Christ, in its peerless unselfishness. "All's right with the world," for the touch of unselfish love was omnipotent over the hearts of men everywhere. The spirit of love, that was the spirit of Jesus. If it ruled in them, there would be no failure; and when their work was done they would be remembered among those who had served their brethren, worthy to be called fellow-citizens of the saints and of the household of God. In conclusion, giving to each of the students in turn the hand of brotherly fellowship, Mr. Blatchford addressed to them individual words of welcome and encouragement, thus, with a concluding hymn and benediction, bringing the beautiful and impressive service to a close.

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual summer meeting of Trustees was held on Friday morning in the Library, the President, Mr. W. Colfox, in the chair.

On the motion of Mr. Harry Rawson, seconded by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, a renewed expression of grateful acknowledgment for their services was offered to the Principal, professors, and lecturers, and acknowledged by Dr. Drummond.

The Rev. J. E. Carperter moved a vote of thanks to the Visitors for their services, and to the Master of Balliol for his address, the delivery of which, he said, conferred distinction on the college. The motion was seconded by Mr. W. Long, and acknowledged by Dr. Caird, who said that he felt it a privilege to address students of theology on so important a subject.

The President then said that he wished to take that opportunity of calling attention to the long services of Mr. Steinthal, who was their senior member in time of service on the Committee, and as chairman for two periods had rendered great services. There was a special reason for that reference. On the previous evening they had been deeply impressed by the valedictory service, and it was just fifty years since Mr. Steinthal occupied the position of the students who were then welcomed into the ministry. He tendered to Mr. Steinthal their heartfelt good wishes.

The Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who spoke with deep feeling, said that it was not easy to look back upon fifty years, or to make reply to such cordial words of thanks; but now, after fifty years, he would say that nothing he could do could ever repay the benefits the College had conferred on him, in spirit as well as in learning.

The usual announcements and distribution of essay prizes, &c., having been made to the students, a vote of thanks to the President brought the meeting to a close.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal.

Manchester Domestic Mission.—The Rev. J. W. Bishop, writing from the Mission House, Willert-street, Collyhurst, Manchester, appeals for help in sending a hundred scholars to the Great Hucklow Holiday Home, for a week in July. The cost is about 10s. each, including railway fare, half of which will be paid by the scholars themselves, who have been saving their pence for this purpose week by week throughout the year. The thought of what such a holiday must mean to city children in such a district as Collyhurst may well prompt a generous response to this appeal.

Cribyn.—The congregation at Cribyn, Cardiganshire, has suffered a great loss in the very sudden death on the 20th inst. of Mr. Evan Jones, the father of Mr. Islan Jones, B.A., who is at present studying for the ministry at Manchester College, Oxford. Mr. Jones, who was in his fifty-eighth year, was an artisan, but though he had enjoyed few of the advantages of education, he was one of the most intelligent and devoted laymen in the community of our Welsh churches, and for upwards of twenty years had acted as deacon and treasurer at Cribyn. For a still longer period he had been an efficient and successful teacher in the Sunday-school, and did much to stimulate others by his zeal and faithfulness. The funeral on Tuesday week was attended by a large concourse of people, who assembled to pay their last tribute of respect.

East London Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual outing of the Union was held at Forest Lodge, High Beach, on Saturday, June 21. About twenty were present, and a very enjoyable afternoon was spent in Epping Forest.

Exeter.—The Assembly of West of England Presbyterian Divines was held at George's Meeting, on Wednesday, June 18. This is its 247th year. The Rev. T. W. Chignell, of Exeter, was elected Moderator, this being the fortieth year of his membership, and the Rev. J. Barron was elected Scribe.

Gloucester: The Education Bill.—A meeting, called to protest against the Education Bill, was held in the Raikes Memorial Hall, on Wednesday, the 18th, which was crowded on the occasion. The meeting was promoted by the Gloucester branch of the Midland Education League (of which the Rev. Walter Lloyd is Vice-President). The chair was taken by Mr. J. W. Probyn, C.C. (Churchman), who was supported by Mr. G. H. Kenrick (of Birmingham), Sir William Wedderburn, Mr. R. A. Lister, J.P., C.C., several members of the Gloucester School Board, the President of the Co-operative Society, and all the Nonconformist ministers of the city except the Wesleyans. A resolution condemning the Bill was carried without a dissentient.

Poole.—For the last month the church has been closed for renovation, the services being held in the schoolroom. The church was reopened on Thursday evening, June 19, when a special service was held, the sermon being preached by the Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth. There was a good congregation, and everyone was delighted with the improved appearance of the church.

Tavistock.—The Abbey Chapel Sunday-school Anniversary was held last Sunday, and was very successful; in the evening there was a crowded congregation; the Rev. J. Barron preached. The banner was displayed for the first time. There is a beautiful picture of the Abbey Chapel painted on it, and on gold scrolls the wording: "Abbey Chapel, Tavistock, 1660. 'Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is Liberty.'" This motto formed the subject of the morning sermon.

When among us Channing proclaimed the divinity of human nature, and when everybody else came to believe it, you thus called into being all sorts and conditions of men as fellow-workmen together with God. This is the fine phrase of Paul's, which we shall not improve upon. That is, you began to rely upon a Landsturm of all the people in the world instead of a coterie or merely a class. Here is an acquisition of forces, a thousand to one, if you simply count numbers, over the forces which the Mediæval Church, the Church of Rome, the Church of Calvin, the Church of England, could rely upon, which gave to it energy for the aggressive business of bringing in the kingdom of God.—Edward Everett Hale.

ABERYSTWYTH

("The Biarritz of Wales")

Is highly recommended for invalids, and possesses the most equable temperature, its shore being swept by the Gulf Stream and S.W. breezes of the Atlantic. The drainage is perfect, and the town is supplied with the purest water from Plymlimmon. The late Sir James Clarke, M.D., says: "A fortnight is equivalent to a month's residence in most watering places." Guides on application to the Town Clerk.

MARRIAGES.

CARTER—HUTCHINSON—On the 23rd June, Newcastle-on-Tyne, at the Church of the Divine Unity, by the Rev. Arthur Harvie, John Francis, son of Charles Carter, to Ida M., youngest daughter of Henry Hutchinson, all of Newcastle-on-Tyne.

MARTINEAU—NETTLEFOLD—On the 20th June, at the Unitarian Church, Brixton, by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, Howard, third son of David Martineau, of Clapham Park, S.W., to Dorothy, youngest daughter of Frederick Nettlefold, of Streatham Grove, Norwood, S.E.

DEATHS.

WADE—On the 15th June, at Rookwood, Bowdon Cheshire, Sarah, wife of Richard Wade, aged 73 years. Interred at Hale Chapel.

THE MESSAGE TO SOUTH AFRICA.

WITH reference to the message to the defeated Republicans, I have something to say.

It seems impossible to get fair play from the dominant Briton unless you please him. When the Republicans stood up to him they were "insolent"; when they bewildered him they were "treacherous"; when they made the bravest part of their heroic stand they were "brigands"; and all through they were savages. But the moment they gave in they were covered with grotesque adulation. Why cannot we be just when we are displeased?

Take the case of this message. The dominant Briton could not bear to have it said that he had done wrong. He wanted to be flattered and cheered, and some of us presented him with a confession of sin—a grave offence! Then began the old story. We were "traitors." We ought to be shot. We deserved all the rest of the penalties devised by a too familiar "patriotism." Why? We were told that we were asking the defeated Republicans to do something that would re-commence the fight. Of course that was grossly unjust, and simply meant that the dominant Briton was displeased—or, perhaps, frightened. The message expressly excluded everything of the kind. It simply indicated the undoubted fact that an arrangement like that just concluded could not be "for all time"; and it pointed to "the steady growth of a great democracy, of free institutions, and of a resolute patriotism" as the hope of the future; and, by specific mention, excluded war.

Vast numbers of thoughtful persons in this country (and in every part of it) see this quite clearly. We are pledged to give self-government and freedom as in Australia. Well, and what is Australia to-day? A commonwealth, bound to us by ties that depend entirely upon sentiment for their continuance. If the Australian commonwealth wished to be a United States of Australia, should we fire a shot to prevent it? Not one.

That then is the possible and logical outcome of the self-government to which we are pledged and which is absolutely unpreventable in South Africa; so that the message only indicated an ideal which is pretty sure to become the real, in time, when the conditions indicated in the message arrive.

But why say all this now? Precisely because this is the time to say it, and because it is wanted now. The confession of wrong-doing must determine, or ought to determine, from the very first, our dealings with these people, and should limit our expectations. Moreover, the setting up by us of the ideal indicated is sure to soothe and animate thousands of sore and embittered spirits. Our message tells them that if the growth of a great democracy of free institutions, and of patriotism, should point to a United States of South Africa, and lead to that, there are Britons who will bid them God-speed. Our message, therefore is, in the profoundest sense, a calming and steadying message of goodwill and peace.

The sentiment of freedom is indestructible, and the way to good feeling and peace is not to repress it, or to pretend that it is not there (a dangerous delusion!) but to respect it, and to give it hope.

If this created bad feeling, it could only do so where there is a bad spirit, and where, behind a rather nauseous adulation of these "noble Boers," there is still the old anti-English desire to ride over them or hold them down.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IT has been a week of the most anxious suspense, after the severe operation to which the King was obliged to submit on Tuesday week, though happily with growing confidence in the issue. The deepest sympathies have been stirred, not only throughout this nation, but in every land. The people have been brought much nearer to their King than they would have been by the gorgeous pageant of the Coronation, touched with admiration at the manly spirit he has shown throughout, and his genuine concern for the national disappointment. The following lines express a feeling which is very widespread at the present moment.

JUNE 26, 1902.

FATE did her worst; she flung the pomp away,
She hushed the ready cheer, she turned aside
The outward homage, and the flowing tide
Of high congratulation. All the gay
Banners and wreaths, the rose, the palm, the bay,
Miles of proud emblems as in mockery shone
Above a saddened people, and alone
Wrestling with pain and death the Monarch lay.
Fate wrought in vain; the show but not the fact
She seized, for, by a mute spontaneous act,
Imperial millions, met in grief and prayer,
Acclaimed him monarch; truly he lies there,
Though in the land no joyful plaudits sound,
King—in his people's hearts securely crowned.

J. WILSON.

A SERVICE of intercession for the King's recovery was held in St. Paul's Cathedral on Thursday week, which all those who were to have been present at the Coronation Service in the Abbey were invited to attend. The Evangelical Nonconformists of the Free Church Council on the same day held a service, at the City Temple, of intercession "for the King and Dr. Parker." On Sunday many impressive services, marked by deep and genuine feeling, were held. A special service in the Marlborough House Chapel was attended by the Queen, when the Bishop of Winchester gave an address based upon James i. 4, "Let patience have her perfect work." Speaking of the events of the past few days, he said :—

"The whole world," it was truly written eight days since, "seems resolved to make of King Edward its central figure." And then, in a single forenoon, some forty-eight hours before the moment when every eye and heart were to be fixed upon the ancient chair in the Abbey choir, we were suddenly summoned, as by a trumpet-call, to look elsewhere instead; to look away from

That immemorial regal stone
Symbol of sovereignty;

away from the streets

Where the long glories prance and triumph by;

and to turn instead to the hushed sick-room in the shadowed home, and to lift our hands in silent prayer to the Lord to Whom alone belong the issues of life and death. Nothing, I suppose, quite like that in its startlingness—nothing certainly on such a scale—has ever happened in the world before, and it cannot have happened in vain, for England or for the world. We have crowded into one little week the whole sequence of bewildering thoughts—the buoyant expectancy, the crushing numbness of disappointment and dismay, the solemn suspense from hour to hour, and now the whole-hearted thankfulness for the strain relieved, the fears lightened, if we dare not yet say dispelled. Let us give thanks unto our Lord. It is meet and right so to do.

ON Tuesday the King's condition was judged to be so far satisfactory that the Queen attended the review of Colonial troops by the Prince of Wales on the Horse Guards' Parade, and again on Wednesday the review of the Indian troops. Thursday's news was again thoroughly satisfactory, and people begin to breathe more freely. Tuesday was Dominion Day, the anniversary of Canadian federation in 1867, and after the review the Canadian contingent paraded before the picturesque Canadian arch in Whitehall in presence of Sir Wilfred Laurier and a great concourse of people, and in the evening the event was further celebrated by a banquet at the Hotel Cecil, at which Sir Wilfred spoke eloquently of the contrasted lessons of their July 1 anniversary and the American July 4. Both have lessons to teach in the history of nations.

IN this anniversary number, celebrating THE INQUIRER'S Diamond Jubilee, we publish many greetings from friends near and distant, overflowing with kindness and good-wishes for the future; and next week we shall have many more to add to these. In addition to these letters, we have had messages from other valued friends, who, for one reason or another, were unable to write more, but sent us, in this way, their good wishes—the Rev. Stopford Brooke, who had been away in the West of Ireland (whose sermon on "The Universal Pentecost" appeared in our Jubilee number in 1892); the Rev. William James, of Llandyssul, S. Wales; and the Rev. James Hocart of Brussels, who adds how greatly he has been indebted to THE INQUIRER, in his isolated outpost of duty.

THE July and August numbers of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's Sermons for the Day are issued together, the one "A Sermon of Peace," the other "A Sermon of Coronation." The latter, preached in anticipation of an event which unhappily could not take place, is published as delivered, and contains some timely lessons. It goes through the various ceremonies of the Coronation service with "its mingled spirituality and feudalism," and shows how amid the gorgeous display and the "half-religious awe of the fleshly monarch," the solemn tones of the Church are heard aiming straight "at the conscience of the man under the robe and state of the monarch," bidding him remember justice and mercy, and compassion, and to be strong and play the man. They who framed the service in the old days, when it was no light thing to oppose the arbitrary will of a monarch, were indeed men who doubtless honoured the King, but feared God yet more. And then the sermon passed to the reminder that the real sovereignty resides no longer in the king, but in the people.

The King is a symbol of the unity of the great English nation, whether in the narrower sense or that wider sense which makes that nation look up to every sky that circles the sphere of earth. The kingship is ours, and every Englishman ought to feel as though some portion of that golden and jewelled crown which will rest on the head of King Edward, touched his own brow and reconsecrated him to kingly service. We ought to feel as if those solemn counsels to equity and mercy, to courage and honour, to truth and high deeds were spoken afresh to us; as if England received afresh her consecration; and prayer were ascending to the King of kings, the only Ruler of nations, that each Englishman and woman may in the coming time strive to weave purity and nobility and love and consecration into that vast and potent and fateful unity, the character of England, amongst the nations of the world.

The "Sermon of Peace" was preached in Hope-street Church on June 8, and in it Mr. Armstrong gives expression to the thankfulness in which all are united, whatever their judgment as to the war may have been:

The blessed proclamation of peace rings in our ears as a call to try to unite in giving expression to the higher consciousness and idealism of the English race. Whatever view we take of the circumstances, the policies, the actions which have led up to the present position, it is the present position with which we all have now to do. Here is a population—like our own, of the energetic Teutonic blood—which has been striving with us in a struggle of life and death. The struggle is at an end, at any rate in the form of physical war, and these men have become our fellow-citizens. Their future and ours are bound together. We have to follow a common destiny. We have to discover a common ideal. We have, if may be, to unite in a common purpose, a common labour, a common hope for the time to come. The hearts of Englishmen are drawn together to-day as they have not been for years, in the desire to be just, nay, even to be generous to these brave burghers who have fought so heroically, and to their wives and children, or such as have survived the awful scourge of war. Every Englishman of noble heart—and there are millions of Englishmen of noble heart—desires now to enable these people peacefully and prosperously to pursue their industries and to teach them that there are elements in British civilisation and British institutions which shall help and enlarge them; that there shall be no oppression, no tyranny, assuredly no vengeance, no treasuring of injuries on either side; but a leading to a life which may gradually grow to something nobler and better than life in the chapter that is closed.

And then follows the searching question, if our type of civilisation is to prevail in South Africa: What is its real greatness? What is it that we are to give? And the contrast between our ideals of commercialism and aggression and that of other nations, even of "John Chinaman," suggests a thought to which we shall do well to give heed.

And so now that we have conquered this brave and freedom-loving people away there on the veldt, now that we are going to build more cities, and open more mines and multiply wage-labourers with sweating brow, and take in hand the civilisation of all South Africa, I plead with passionate desire for a little humility in our own hearts, a little prayerful pondering of our own ideals, a guard against the danger of only making life for these new fellow-citizens of ours coarser, more vulgar, more of a grinding toil, a grave and determined effort to show to them a civilisation in which morality and true religion shall keep watch and ward, in which not merely shall material riches accumulate in the hands of the few, but the minds and the hearts and the souls of all men shall be made richer in wisdom, in happiness, in service of God and man.

We quoted in last week's leader from the "Ode on the Coronation of King Edward VII.," by William Watson. It is a poem of 145 lines, sumptuously printed in a small quarto volume of thirty-six pages, and published by Mr. John Lane, price 2s. 6d. net. There are also 150 copies of an edition de luxe, on Japanese vellum bound in parchment, at half a guinea net. The form is in keeping with the ceremonial which it had anticipated. The substance is worthy of a great national occasion.

THE AKUREYRI DISASTER.

We have already recorded Mr. Jochumsson's acknowledgment of the gifts of friends in this country, in relief of the distress caused by the disastrous fire at Akureyri last December, but it is due to him and our other friends in that distant island, to publish also the following printed letter, which we have now received:—

To the Editor of "The Inquirer."

My dear Brother,

Will you kindly oblige me by inserting in your excellent paper the following formal acknowledgment from my friends and fellow-managers of the Akureyri Relief Fund.

With cordial greetings and Christian love and sympathy,

I am yours affectionately,

Matth. Jochumsson.

We undersigned members of the municipality of Akureyri desire herewith to tender our heartfelt thanks to the generous Englishmen of the noble Unitarian denomination for their subscription to the Akureyri Relief Fund, which was suggested by the Rev. Mr. R. A. Armstrong's warm-hearted letter, telling of our fire disaster on the 19th Dec. last year, and resolutely started by the Rev. Mr. V. D. Davis, editor of The Inquirer.

Mr. Davis's brotherly letter, together with his post-orders, arrived timely (overland from Reykjavik), while the draft only recently came into our hands, owing to long stopping by ice of all commerce by sea. This testimonial of such a rare Christian love and liberality naturally caused a great and joyful surprise in our lonely and distressed community, owing alike to the unexpectedness of the message, and the substantiality of the gift; and now we feel happy to be able to assure our generous donors, that through your help our most needy people were largely relieved and consoled (by getting loans on the draft) during the rest of the winter, the severity of which would have made our sufferers feel themselves much more unfortunate but for your most timely and beautiful aid.

May God Almighty reward, bless, and prosper you!

We remain, yours most respectfully and cordially,

Kl. Jonsson, mayor.
J. W. Havesteen, consul.
Fr. Kristiansson, merchant.
Frb. Steinsson, bookseller.
Matth. Jochumsson, ex-pastor

Akureyri, June 1, 1902.

In a further letter Mr. Jochumsson tells of the delight with which he has read the reports of our Whitsuntide meetings, and how much he rejoices in the election of Mr. Armstrong as President of the B. and F.U.A. And then he proceeds:—

"We of this quarter of Iceland are preparing the annual meeting of the clergy in our diocese (that of Molar, formerly the second bishopric of our land). We voted last year at that free and modern synod of ours against the Danish Inner Mission, which sent a message to win our permission to send a missionary or two to work here. Now they have settled at Reykjavik, and have determined to begin their work in spite of our remonstrances. Against their aggressive and violent enterprise I am preparing my formal 'Declaration of Independence!' [Mr. Jochumsson feels that in these representatives of the 'Inner Mission' he has to oppose the narrowest form of Evangelical bigotry.] Else our programme is generally of a constructive nature, not a negative one, as the sorest want here is a practical reform on almost every line of usefulness. At the former meetings (which we gather and hold without any payment or authoritative sanction) the liberal-mindedness of the majority has been very striking and encouraging to me, an avowed Unitarian, as when I last year read Mr. Stopford Brooke's sermon at your grand meetings, and every man rose to his feet. Still there is a minority in decided opposition to my views."

Mr. Jochumsson adds how much he has longed to be present once more at our annual meetings; but he is over seventy, and though feeling still "strong and quite young," he can hardly hope to make that long journey again. And after all, he adds, there is a yet deeper want: Goethe's "Mehr licht!" Yet that light, he is assured, is always everywhere, and he finds his consolation with Whittier—

And so the windows of my heart
I open to the day!

BRAHMO GIRLS' SCHOOL BUILDING FUND.

In connection with the above the following letter has been received from Calcutta, dated June 4, 1902:—

Dear Sir,—I have much pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter dated May 13, together with a draft for £205 5s. (or Rs. 3,078.11), being the amount generously contributed by our Unitarian friends in England to the building fund of the Brahmo Girls' School in Calcutta. I do not know how to thank you all enough, and particularly yourself, for the opportune help. This is but one more instance of the kind interest that the Unitarian body has always felt in the work of the Brahmo Somaj. I can assure you that this kindly sympathy of our Unitarian brethren with the cause of the education of the Brahmo girls will be greatly appreciated by the whole Brahmo community, and I would ask you to convey our sincere thanks to the kind contributors to the fund.

I would also beg to inform you that exclusive of your substantial contribution, Rs. 25,000 have been subscribed up to date. The Government of Bengal has also promised a grant from the public funds, and has called on us to submit an estimate for the proposed building. We have been preparing the required estimate, and are on the look out for a suitable site. As soon as the amount of the Government grant is definitely known, it is proposed to take the work of construction in hand.

Thanking you again for your kind interest and sympathy,—I am, yours truly,

Kali Narayan Roy, Hon. Sec.

To Ion Pritchard, Esq.

The friends of the Rev. J. Worsley Austin, M.A., will be glad to hear of his return to this country. His four years' experience in a first pastorate in America will be of value to him here. Letters may be addressed to him at Cleeve Hill Stratton, Cirencester.

OUR SIXTY YEARS.

AT the Jubilee of THE INQUIRER in 1892, the history of our paper was fully recorded in the issue of July 9, with a special supplement. In that number the late P. W. Clayden told the story of the origin of the paper, more fully given in his "Life of Samuel Sharpe," and of its early editors. The Rev. T. L. Marshall told of his long experience as editor, covering more than half of the sixty years of THE INQUIRER'S life, and Sir John Robinson contributed some reminiscences, a kindness which he repeats in our present number. We are indebted also to Mr. Hodgson Pratt and Mr. Smith Osler for reminiscences of the old days, and will add here only a brief record, with some notes of successive numbers of THE INQUIRER at intervals of ten years.

The Rev. William Hincks, the first editor of THE INQUIRER, held office for nearly five years, from the publication of the first number, July 9, 1842, until May 29, 1847, when he bade farewell to his readers. For some months during the following year and a half the late Rev. Thomas Sadler had editorial charge, and later Mr. Henry Enfield and the Rev. C. L. Corkran, until at the beginning of 1849, Mr. John Lalor, of whom Sir John Robinson writes with so much feeling, became for too brief a period the editor.

Two years later began the régime of the late John Langton Sanford (as Mr. Smith Osler relates) with the help of R. H. Hutton and other friends. Of this brilliant episode in the life of THE INQUIRER we cannot refrain from reproducing here the account which Mr. Hutton himself gave in the memoir which he prefixed to the first volume of Walter Bagehot's "Literary Studies." It will be seen that Mr. Smith Osler also refers to this.

In 1851 a knot of young Unitarians, of whom I was then one, headed by the late Mr. Langton Sanford—afterwards the historian of the Great Rebellion, who survived Bagehot barely four months—had engaged to help for a time in conducting THE INQUIRER, which then was, and still is, the chief literary and theological organ of the Unitarian body. Our régime was, I imagine, a time of great desolation for the very tolerant and thoughtful constituency for which we wrote; and many of them, I am confident, yearned, and were fully justified in yearning, for those better days when this tyranny of ours should be overpast. Sanford and Osler did a good deal to throw cold water on the rather optimist and philanthropic politics of the most sanguine, because the most benevolent and open-hearted of Dissenters. Roscoe criticised their literary work from the point of view of a devotee of the Elizabethan poets; and I attempted to prove to them in distinct heads: first, that their laity ought to have the protection afforded by a liturgy against the arbitrary prayers of their ministers; and next, that at least the great majority of their sermons ought to be suppressed, and the habit of delivering them discontinued almost altogether. Only a denomination of "just men," trained in tolerance for generations, and in that respect at least, made all but "perfect," would have endured it all; but I doubt if any of us caused the Unitarian body so much grief as Bagehot, who never was a Unitarian, but who contributed a series of brilliant letters on the coup d'état, in which he trod just as heavily on the toes of his colleagues as he did on those of the public by whom THE INQUIRER was taken.

It was in 1856 that the Rev. T. L. Marshall, the minister at Hackney, entered upon his thirty-two years of editorship, with whom in the management of the paper the late Richard Bartram was long closely associated. In 1885 THE INQUIRER Publishing Company was formed, and acquired the paper from Mr. Marshall and Mr. Bartram. With the close of 1887 Mr. Marshall retired from the editorship, and was succeeded by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who held the post for ten years, from 1888 to the close of 1897, being followed at the beginning of 1898 by the Rev. V. D. Davis, the present editor.

THE INQUIRER. "Truth—Freedom—Charity." No. 1. London: Saturday, July 9, 1842. Price Sixpence.

The leading article in this first number is headed with the motto: "I seek after TRUTH, by which no man ever yet was injured."—M. Antoninus. It makes the following declaration:—

> We propose to ourselves to make known, defend, and apply the views and opinions of a body of persons who have hitherto found no representative in the public Press, excepting so far as all that is called Liberal may be taken as representing them.
> The body to be represented pride themselves, it is said, on being anti-sectarian; but, it is added,
> if to regard the great questions of religion and morals as deserving of serious thought; strongly to feel, and to endeavour practically to apply our convictions upon them; to account it a solemn duty, owing alike to God, our fellow-creatures, and ourselves, openly to avow our sentiments, and to desire and seek the sympathy and co-operation of those who partake in them, be deemed sectarian—we glory in the name, and would use our best endeavours to diffuse this spirit.
> . . . . .
> It will be a leading object with us to advocate the rights of conscience, and the most extended views of religious freedom and charity.

This first number contains a brief report of the "Provincial Meeting of the Presbyterian and Unitarian Ministers in Lancashire and Cheshire" held at Warrington, when the Rev. John Colston of Styal was the preacher, and the service was taken by the Rev. John Robberds of the Park Chapel, Liverpool. There is a longer report of the annual public examinations of Manchester New College, at that time still in Manchester, among the students who gained prizes being Travers Madge and R. D. Darbishire. Among the prize-winners at University College, London, there is a special interest, in view of the future history of THE INQUIRER, in noting the names of John L. Sanford (History prize and several certificates), R. H. Hutton (prizes for Latin, Greek, German and Mathematics), T. Smith Osler (prizes for Latin and Greek). The first book review in this number is of John Bowring's "Memoirs of Bentham." In a report of an Anti-Corn Law Conference in London, Mr. P. A. Taylor in the chair, it is stated:—

> Mr. Bright, of Rochdale, showed that the distress was not local, but almost universal, and hinted, amid loud cheers, at the power which the people had to compel the adoption of the only true remedy, the repeal of the Corn Laws.

No. 523. July 10, 1852. Price Sixpence.

The leading article in this number is on "The General Election," and there are several columns of election intelligence. There is a review by the late Russell Carpenter of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and a full report of the fifty-first annual meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association, at Chichester, when the Rev. Henry Solly was the preacher.

No. 1,044. July 5, 1862. Price Fivepence; sixpence, stamped.

The leader is on "Dr. Lushington's Judgment," in the case of Dr. Rowland Williams, one of the heretics of "Essays and Reviews." There is a review of Theodore Parker's "Prayers," by J. Page Hopps. The prize list of University College, London, is full of familiar names. J. Edwin Odgers has prizes for Ancient History and Latin; J. Estlin Carpenter prizes for Greek and Mathematics; and in the class lists are also the names of P. H. Wicksteed, R. A. Armstrong, David Ainsworth, J. S. Ainsworth, L. M. Aspland, C. H. Darbishire, and E. H. Busk. There is an American Letter and a report of the A.U.A. annual meeting in Boston.

No. 1,567. July 6, 1872. Price 5d.

The leader is on "The Bampton Lecturer on Unitarianism," followed by an article on "The French Reformed Church," and a third on "Mr. Miall's Motion" for Disestablishment, from the point of view of "For our own part we are willing to leave the Established Church to itself." The first review is of "The Autobiography of Satan. Edited by J. R. Beard." There is a letter from Robert Collyer on the May Meetings at Boston, and a paper by Brooke Herford on "The Conditions and Limits of Denominational Life," read at the recent Provincial Assembly meeting at Rochdale. There is also a farewell letter from Mr. John Kovacs, on returning from Manchester New College, where he had been studying, to Hungary.

No. 2,089. July 8, 1882. Price 5d.

The leader is on "Suitable and Unsuitable Topics of Preaching," and the second article on "Religion in Modern Rome." There is a memorial article on "Franklin Howorth," by Russell Carpenter; one of Mr. W. D. Jeremy's papers on "Dr. Williams's Trust," a Visitor's Address at the Home Missionary Board, by the Rev. A. Gordon, and a Confirmation address at Kidderminster by the late Dr. Sadler.

[At the beginning of 1883, the price of THE INQUIRER was reduced to twopence, and in October, 1889, to a penny.]

No. 2,611. New Series, No. 351. July 9, 1892, One Penny.

This was the jubilee number, issued with a special supplement.

WE shall do our best work when, like Jesus, we come from our mount of vision with faces aglow with the light of God to do it.—F. B. Hornbrooke.

WORDS are mighty, words are living;
Serpents with their venomous stings,
Or bright angels, crowding round us,
With heaven's light upon their wings;
Every word has its own spirit,
True or false, that never dies;
Every word man's lips have uttered
Echoes in God's skies.—A. A. Procter.

FOR FREEDOM AND THE TRUTH.

THE INQUIRER is sixty years old. The present writer has known it for more than forty years; and for not far short of forty years he has written for it, grumbled at it, blushed for or raged against it, speculated on its latent possibilities and wondered why it was not better. Yet he has been conscious that all this time THE INQUIRER has been of vital significance to himself and to his circle of friends. Life would have been a different and a poorer thing without it. And so, on receiving a request to contribute something to this anniversary number he has tried to give himself some account of what THE INQUIRER in its total effect has really been and stood for, and why its total significance seems to be something more and something better than the sum of its weekly effects.

It helps us to see a thing in its true perspective and in its true relation if we can stand away from it. At home and in cities we live in an atmosphere to which many undistinguished currents contribute, but if we get far away into a foreign land, or a remote colony, or deep into the country, we begin to distinguish the several elements and formative influences of our lives and the centres at which they are fostered or whence they emanate. Week by week THE INQUIRER, "rich in thoughts of home," finds scattered members of our flock all the world over, and brings them news of how we, their old companions, are feeling and thinking about the great events of the world, and what are the special questions and interests that are agitating us in our own circle; what are our quieter and deeper thoughts, and what we are fighting about; how the meeting to be held next Thursday (now perhaps last Thursday month) is to decide the whole spiritual future of the world; and how supremely important Mrs. X. feels it to be that Mr. Y.'s views on (say) the cumulative vote, should not be taken as representing the views of "the body," and how much more important Mr. Y. thinks it to make it quite clear that there is no "body" (in the formal sense) to be represented or misrepresented at all. Even the notice that "a highly successful tea party was held at —— and the proceedings concluded by a hearty vote of thanks moved by Mr. A.B." may start a delicious reverie, or may bring news of a buried hatchet and a promise of future good that will make the sun shine all the brighter. Perhaps there is never a single issue of THE INQUIRER that does not give a grip of the hand to some far off friend and wake associations in him that help to keep his heart warm, and, for that matter to keep his will firm and his sight straight by keeping alive in him the consciousness that he too has his noblesse with all its "obligations." This is no fancy sketch. Tens, perhaps hundreds, who see these words will recognise their truth.

Merely as a kind of family organ then THE INQUIRER would have its significance, a significance realised by the distant few, but effectively experienced, even when unrecognised, by all its readers and by many who do not so much as read it.

But if THE INQUIRER were only a family organ it would have no significance outside the family. And this is not so. THE INQUIRER takes an unobtrusive place of its own amongst the liberalising forces of its day. Probably very few of its readers are aware how far its influence spreads. Those who happen to have opportunities of meeting members of many Churches have often been surprised to find how widely THE INQUIRER is known, and perhaps have experienced mild twinges of remorse when they have contrasted the respect with which it is universally mentioned by outsiders, with the unkind things sometimes said of it by them of its own household. Not long ago the present writer heard of a Catholic priest who takes THE INQUIRER regularly, and takes no other religious paper. In the latter respect he may be peculiar, but in the former he perhaps has his counterparts in almost every other communion. Nor is it in England alone that THE INQUIRER is circulated. The late Professor Kuenen was a diligent student of it and used to astonish his English friends by the amount of information he drew from it. "Everything is in THE INQUIRER," he used to say, "if you have the trick of finding it." And in late years anxious eyes in Kuenen's country have searched the columns of THE INQUIRER (whether in vain or not let each ask himself) for some word that should rise above the passions of the moment and keep alive the spirit and the sense of brotherhood in days of conflict and embitterment.

As to Germany, we are naturally and rightly accustomed to think more of our never-ceasing obligations to her literature than of anything we can do in return. Yet into the German press a quiet runlet of liberalising and spiritualising thought is constantly trickling from the columns of THE INQUIRER; and it finds, we are assured, many a "lip that it may cheer" which would not have been reached by any other stream.

These facts, all of which have come under the direct knowledge of one who was in no way seeking for them, must be representative of many more; and surely they are significant. What, then, do they signify? It is true that there is never a number of THE INQUIRER that does not contain matter of real value. But is it not also true that comparatively few numbers contain anything of such distinguished power as would make us expect it to break its way beyond the boundaries of our own connexion? The same question repeats itself when we turn from THE INQUIRER to the community which it represents. We have from time to time had men of great eminence amongst us. We have seldom or never been without a few men of mark. But if we compare ourselves with others vanity itself can hardly suggest that we have any pre-eminence in scholarship, in good works, or in personal distinction. Yet we count for more than our numbers warrant. The possibility of such a gathering as that held a year ago in Essex Hall, and other somewhat similar events in times past, are amongst the indications that in spite of our extreme individualism we stand collectively for something more than the sum of our personalities. What is it?

It lies, as we all feel, in certain undefined and undefinable traditions which have given us an unreserved confidence in open "Inquiry," a profound distrust of authorised dogmas and a profound respect for personal conviction. Everything is officially an open question; but a man who has no personal convictions has no significance for us. Even dogmatism and intolerance we can tolerate, perhaps respect, in the individual, but we resist every attempt to get them officially stamped. Is it not, in great part, this respect for personal conviction that gives us our strength? Quite commonplace people become interesting as soon as they express any direct and personal impression, conviction, or experience; and the most distinguished become insignificant when they set themselves to express that which they think the occasion requires rather than that which the occasion has actually struck out of them,—to say what they think will be good for some cause rather than to express their own inmost conviction.

A Paper that represents a party, or a sect, or an ecclesiastical interest, or a school of thought, will consider whether this or that utterance is likely to prejudice it in the eyes of the public, or to raise inconvenient questions. It will desire its contributors to utter as much of what they think as will tend to edification or unity or impressiveness. But THE INQUIRER, true to its title, has always been characterised by a fine recklessness in its respect for personal conviction. Its successive Editors, whatever their views as to the extent to which they should themselves qualify or emphasise the expression of their own convictions, have always practically recognised the principle that their hospitality must not be limited by anxious regard as to the "effect" of any utterance of which their Paper is the natural vehicle. They have attempted, and, in general, successfully, to make it the true reflection of the spiritual, the intellectual, the social and the political life and aspiration of those whom it represents, with all their obvious conflicts and diversities and only just so much underlying unity as is really there. Hence a sincerity that has given a dignity and a significance beyond anything that the intrinsic intellectual and spiritual power of its speech can account for.

Whether THE INQUIRER has ever swerved from this principle we do not ask; but the measure of its fidelity to it has, we believe, been the measure of its power, and so it will be in the future.

Those who have real confidence in our common traditions can trust the bond to hold, however severe the strain, so long as we dare to give and dare to claim freedom for the utterance of personal conviction on all questions of vital interest to religion and morality. But if ever the time should come when suppression is demanded as the price of peace, or even as the price of continued existence, the virtue will have gone out of our union; and as there is no more ignominious so likewise there is no more futile course than to sacrifice vital principles in fear of death.

Et propter vitam vivendi perdere causas.

Cordial Greetings from Professor Bonet-Maury and the Rev. E. Fontanès, of Paris; Professor George Boros, of Koloszvár, Hugary; Dr. Schieler, of Königsberg; the Rev. P. H. Hungenhotz, of Amsterdam; and the Rev. Tony Andre, of Florence, we are obliged to reserve for next week.

GREETINGS FROM ABROAD.

ACCEPT from your fellow believers and fellow-workers on this side of the Atlantic our heartiest congratulations on your journal's sixtieth anniversary. Your faithful and courageous testimony to the principles and aims of the liberal movement in theology has been one of the potent factors of its persistence and spread in the old world and the new. And still your earnest witness is given, your influence is greater than ever, and your word, as has recently been shown in your reports of the International Council, goes forth to illumine every corner of the earth. Wishing you long continued life and usefulness, I am, yours,

CHAS. W. WENDTE.

Boston, Mass.

WE in America join in congratulations to THE INQUIRER over the completion of its sixtieth year. The old controversies between Unitarians and Trinitarians have lost their interest, but new issues have arisen. Men are asking searching questions which reach to the foundations not only of faith, but of morals. They are seeking some religious sanction for conduct, and some spiritual ideal.

We Unitarians have one advantage, and that is our freedom. There is nothing to prevent our giving ourselves to the work which the times demand.

I sometimes hear it said that we are living in a period of reaction, that there is a trend towards forms and ceremonies, and that we must imitate rather than originate, for the demand is for ecclesiastical propriety rather than for free and clear thought.

I think that the mistake lies in taking a conventional view of the religious situation.

The important thing is not to ascertain the tastes of the people who at present go to church, but to ask, Does the Church express the best life and thought of the community? Why do so many thoughtful and earnest persons, with high ethical ideals, drift away from all church fellowship? They do not care for clerical pretensions or ecclesiastical symbolism. They do care for the regeneration of society and for the development of character.

The religious newspaper is the best means we have of reaching these men and women and showing them the possibility of a really free Church.

SAMUEL M. CROTHERS.

Cambridge, Mass., June 23.

To the brave INQUIRER, the indefatigable champion for religious freedom and truth, all good wishes to its sixtieth birthday.

Das Protestantenblatt, R. EMDE.

Bremen, Juli, 1902.

HEARING that early in July THE INQUIRER will be 60 years old, I want to send you, as editor of that old and faithful Unitarian periodical, my best wishes for the new period in which you are now entering. Sixty years, a long lifetime for a man, and also for a newspaper! But a man cannot hope to have a new period of strength and growing at that age; a newspaper, especially when it is the organ of a living and ever active spirit, may rightly cherish the ambition to begin a new life and a new youth.

As a French Unitarian, son and grandson of Unitarians, I hope very much THE INQUIRER may go on for long years under your editorship. Since the first days when I heard of English Unitarianism, I have been accustomed to look upon THE INQUIRER as the true representative of our principles in England. So it is for me a duty to write to you with an expression of my thanks for all that your periodical has done for the good cause, and my confidence in its future career as agent of free faith and the continuous reform of Christian society.

JEAN RÉVILLE, D.D.

Professor in the Protestant Faculty of Theology in the University of Paris.

Paris, June 27.

WHILE heartily congratulating the impending sixtieth anniversary of the foundation of THE INQUIRER, I have much pleasure in acknowledging the great help and benefit which, during many years, I have personally derived from such an excellent religious, political, and literary publication.

I shall always remember with deep gratitude the gracious and generous support it has constantly given, together with the Christian Life, to my humble endeavours after a liberal and truly catholic Christianity in my country—from the day its columns opened a subscription in behalf of the work of Athanase Coquerel, Junior, in Paris, and myself in Milan, up to the present hour.

Be pleased, therefore, graciously to accept my warmest thanks, together with my best wishes and prayers for an ever-wider spreading in England and everywhere of the liberal religious thought and life which THE INQUIRER, for above half a century, has so ably, devoutly, and fearlessly advocated.

From the Editor of "Le Progrès Religieux," Geneva.

MON CHER REDACTEUR,—

Dans quelques jours l'INQUIRER va célébrer la soixantième anniversaire de sa fondation. Le Progrès Religieux est heureux à cette saison d'exprimer à son confrère de Londres ses félicitations les plus sincères et ses voeux les plus ardents. Puisse l'INQUIRER continuer longtemps encore son service émancipatrice et bénie au sein du Protestantism anglais.

Les voeux que je présente, au nom de la rédaction du Progrès Religieux, je les formule d'autant plus volontiers que l'œuvre poursuivie par l'INQUIRER est la même que celle que nous nous efforçons d'accomplir ici. L'identité du but que nous cherchons à atteindre, vous à Londres et en Angleterre, nous à Genève et en Suisse, a été mis pleinement en lumière par les réunions solennelles du Congrès Unitaire tenu dans votre capitale. Que voulons nous, les uns et les autres? À quoi aspirons-nous? Quel idéal religieux est le vôtre et le nôtre?

Ce que nous voulons, c'est l'affranchisement des consciences, dans la domaine de la religion. Nous établissons une distinction profonde et absolue, dans le Christianisme, entre les principes et les vérités éternelles proclamées par Jésus, et les formes dogmatiques et ecclésiastiques dont les Chrétiens ont revêtu ces principes et ces vérités. Ces formes, nous les tenons pour dignes de respect, mais nous les considérons comme des expressions imparfaites, passagères, modifiables et perfectibles des principes et des vérités qu'elles représentent et symbolisent. Vouloir accorder à ces formes une valeur absolue, et une durée en quelque sorte éternelle, telle est l'erreur dont les consequences sont incalculables, erreur déplorable et fatale, contre laquelle nous ne cesserons de protester et de lutter.

Ce que nous voulons aussi, et non moins délibérément, vous et nous, c'est l'édification des âmes, ce qui constitue l'essence de toute réligion et du Christianisme en particulier, c'est la communion avec Dieu, c'est l'union spirituelle avec le Père céleste, c'est la vie en Dieu, en donnant à cette expression une signification la plus large. C'est cette communion de notre esprit avec l'esprit divin, et avec tous les grands esprits religieux de l'humanité, et au premier rang desquels nous plaçons Jésus notre Maître, qui est le centre de notre vie religieuse, la meilleure point de notre être spirituel. C'est cette intimité religieuse, si vraie, si profonde, si bienfaisante, qui a trouvé en Jésus un expression parfaite; c'est elle que nous voulons apprendre à connaître et à pratiquer à tous ceux d'entre nos frères qui voudront préter l'oreille à nos exhortations.

Je conçois donc le Christianisme à un double point de vue: d'une part comme la religion émancipatrice par excellence des consciences, et comme telle l'inspiratrice de ces admirables travaux de la Critique biblique qui ont exercé une influence si profonde sur la dogmatique et l'Eglise;—d'autre part, comme la religion le plus spirituelle et le plus mystique, c'est à dire comme le plus apte à nous faire entrer en communion avec Dieu. Le programme que j'expose en ces quelques mots est celui du Christianisme libéral, tel que vous et nous le comprenons.

Ce Christianisme libéral, ainsi compris et entendu, nous avons la conviction que l'avenir lui est réservé. Cette conviction repose sur un fait que nous constatons tous les jours; le Christianisme libéral répond à une nécessité du temps présent, la nécessité d'avoir une religion qui ne soit point en opposition avec le développement scientifique de notre époque, mais qui corresponde à la civilisation moderne et soit en harmonie avec elle; le Christianisme libéral satisfait, par sa haute spiritualité et ses élans enthousiastiques vers le divin, les besoins spirituels de notre temps.

Croyez, mon cher Redacteur, à la sincérité et à la profondeur des voeux que nous formons pour l'INQUIRER, que vous dirigez d'une manière si remarquable et si conforme aux principes du Christianisme libéral.

EDOUARD MONTET, Doyen.

Genève, le 26 Juin.

Do people like thinking? Some do, but most of them prefer repeating other men's thoughts to the trouble of thinking themselves. So at least it is in matters of religion. Still there cannot be a real conviction without real thinking, there cannot be a real faith without independent thought.

In the last sixty years many things have changed. Natural science and study of the Bible, excavations and explorations, anthropology and history of religions have been so many battering-rams against the walls of orthodoxy, that is "dependent thought." The command "think yourself" has been repeated by THE INQUIRER in various ways. During the sixty years of its existence the paper has done excellent work, excellent but difficult. I am glad that it is not only valued at home but also abroad. I hope it will be a herald of liberal faith for many and many years. B. D. EERDMANS.

Leiden, July 1.

"A HAPPY new year and thank you for the old one," we say in this country. And that is what I wish to say to THE INQUIRER.

In the first place, we simply want to add one voice to the many that are raised to thank THE INQUIRER for all the wise, lofty, encouraging thoughts it carries far and wide; but in the second place, we have our own little tune to pipe. It is the tune of the friend from foreign lands. It is not easy for men of all nationalities to work together. No, not even if the cause they are working for be "of the Universe." If they are to succeed they must work in the spirit of the Universe. Well, that is exactly what makes THE INQUIRER so good, so dear, so valuable a friend to its fellow-labourers of many countries, that whatever be the question it takes up for discussion, the problem it tries to solve, it does it in the spirit of the Universe. It comes to us as our true fellow-citizen in God's great Universe.

And we welcome it, we thank it, and we wish for it a long life and a growing influence among men of all nations.

MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

Folehave, Denmark.

THE sixty years this number of THE INQUIRER closes has witnessed a considerable emancipation of religious thought and life, and many old prejudices faded away. Although rejoicing in the progress of liberal religious aims, we have to watch against the danger that the pruning-knife of our theology might cut not only dead and sterile branches, but also living blossom buds, indispensable for the higher purposes of our life. For it is not in the first place the emancipated Thought we aim at, but the emancipated Love. It is not our intellectual power, nor even our moral purity, but the whole of a strong and sweet personal character, that makes our religious significance.

"When the vision fails, the people perish."

Our greatest need is the grace of true religious inspiration, which enables us to remember the Will of God in our busy lives.

Such was the very comfort of the fire we saw glow in the Whit-week meetings, which brought me together with so many new friends in London—in those days of war a splendid light in the gloom of midnight, opening for our eyes a fascinating and fruitful field for reflection.

So my prayer is, that we may always have the courage and the wisdom, to follow in our religious progress the lead of this inner light and life, nursed in communion with God, open to all influences that come from Him.

THE EDUCATION CRISIS.

THE Education Bill has made substantial, though not rapid, progress in Committee, since we last wrote; this has been largely due to the conciliatory spirit in which Mr. Balfour has met, and in part accepted, proposals which will in some measure go to improve the Bill. At the end of the sitting on Monday, Mr. Lloyd George complimented Mr. Balfour on the manner in which he had piloted the second clause through Committee and the concessions which he had made; Mr. Balfour reciprocated by hoping that the Opposition would discuss the remaining clauses, of a more controversial nature, with the calmness of spirit which they had already displayed. Nothing is lost by such amenities as these, and Mr. Balfour has only to act up to the professions he has made and the assurances he has given that his one desire is to promote the interests of education by continuing to accept proposals, no matter from whence they come, which will make the Bill a good practicable working measure, and we do not think he will find the Opposition unreasonable or irreconcilable.

The Government's proposal, announced last week, to increase the grant-aid from the Treasury by nearly a million pounds, appears to have been received with general satisfaction; it will not only lessen the local burden, but may be looked upon as a further step in the direction of nationalising our system of education. The discussion upon the method proposed for the distribution of this sum is postponed until it is embodied in a later clause; but one thing is plain, if the allocation of the grant is to be equitable, the application of the Bill must be made universal, for otherwise any district which should not adopt the Bill would apparently be deprived of its share of the fund, as the clauses amongst which this financial aid will be included at present only apply to the areas where the act is adopted. It is, at least, probable that Mr. Balfour contemplates dropping the adoptive clause and making the Act compulsory.

The Committee has been engaged, with useful results, in discussing the second clause which applies to Higher Education, or in the more general terms employed in the Bill, "education other than elementary." We ourselves think this term the better one as it covers higher grade schools, technical schools, and the training of teachers, but does not necessarily include secondary schools in which a liberal education is given; at present such schools are not assisted from public funds, and it does not appear likely that the Bill will do anything for them, much as assistance is in some cases desirable. At the same time we confess we shrink from the prospect of seeing them interfered with by the local education authority.

The first and most important amendment was moved by Mr. H. Hobhouse to the effect that Clause 2, which says "The local authority may supply or aid the supply of education other than elementary," should be made compulsory by the substitution of the word "shall" for "may." Mr. Balfour, while agreeing with all Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Bryce and others had to say as to the desirability of promoting higher education, believed it better, in the interests of education itself, to lead educational authorities rather than endeavour to compel them. Probably Mr. Balfour is right in trying to avoid creating fresh prejudice against the Bill by compelling the ratepayer to support education which is not elementary. Upon further discussion, however, Mr. Balfour offered to accept an amendment to the effect that "the local education authority shall consider the needs and take such steps, after consultation with the Education Department, as may seem to them desirable to aid the supply of education other than elementary." To this the Committee agreed as a reasonable compromise, though not giving all that some of them desired. Subsequently after the words "other than elementary"—"including the training of teachers and the general co-ordination of all forms of education" was added, thus indicating the direction in which local education authorities were expected to move.

On the next amendment, moved by Mr. Mather, Mr. Balfour made the welcome admission "that it would be absurd to pretend that it was a vital principle of the Government that the Bill should remain the same in every particular as when it was introduced." The proposal was that the whole of the fund known as the "Whiskey money" should be applied to the purposes of education; in some counties a considerable portion of this fund is still used in relief of rates. Mr. Balfour left it an open question for the Committee to decide, with the result that the amendment was carried by a majority of two.

When the Committee resumed discussion on the Bill on Monday the financial part of the second clause came up for consideration. It was asked, in view of the increased grant to be made for elementary education, that an equivalent grant from the Treasury should be given in aid of higher education; that the Exchequer should contribute for this purpose a sum equal to that raised by the local authority by a rate; but this was negatived.

Another step in the right direction was, however taken immediately after, when it was agreed that County Boroughs should not be limited to a 2d. rate for their expenditure on higher education. Notwithstanding the insistence of the Government that County Council and urban districts should still be restricted in their outlay, the concession as regards boroughs must be regarded as eminently satisfactory. The limitation to a 2d. rate would seriously have crippled education, as, indeed, we believe that some boroughs are even now spending that, or even more.

The case of the County Councils was then pressed, and Mr. Balfour went so far as to consent that the County Council may, with the consent of the Local Government Board, impose a higher rate, the consent of the Board referring only to financial and rating purposes. So far Mr. Balfour and the Committee are to be congratulated on the temper displayed and the progress achieved. If this spirit is maintained the Bill may, after all, emerge from Committee a really useful and practicable measure. But there are rocks ahead!

On Tuesday an extension of the power of smaller boroughs and urban districts to aid secondary education being agreed to, the transformation of the Clause was complete.

The changes thus effected in the Bill are of great importance, and on the whole are for the better, but a proposal made by the leader of the Opposition to report progress, in order that the Committee might review what they had done, led to a slight outbreak of temper, which had the effect of postponing the discussion on the question of religious teaching in secondary schools and colleges.

OBITUARY.

MRS. RICHARD WADE.

IN the death of Mrs. Wade, which took place at Rookwood, Bowdon, on Sunday, June 15, another of a rapidly diminishing band of devoted men and women long associated with Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and Lower Mosley-street Sunday-school, has passed away, at the age of seventy-two. Full of generous impulse and a heart quick to feel for others, Mrs. Wade had gained the warm esteem of a large circle of friends. From childhood she had been attached to Cross-street Chapel, which she regularly attended up to the time of her removal to Bowdon, and shared with her husband his keen interest in its historic records, and venerable traditions. Mrs. Wade was an ardent Unitarian, and one who loved the name. She felt a warm interest in the larger group of our Free Churches, and was ever ready to give a generous response to appeals for their support. She attended the bazaars held in aid of district churches, and often proved a good worker as well as a liberal donor.

Lower Mosley-street Sunday School always held a warm place in her affections. As a scholar she early came under the influence of such honoured teachers as Miss Mary Hall, Miss Agnes Ewart, and Mrs. Gaskell. To the last Mrs. Wade cherished as a loving token of those days the gift from Mrs. Gaskell of one of her first published copies of "Mary Barton." As a teacher Mrs. Wade rendered valuable service, and many still remember her activity and usefulness at the annual festivities and the scholars' excursions to Dunham Park. She cherished to the last the many friendships she had formed, and continued to manifest the warmest interest in the welfare of the school which had truly become a second home to her.

On Thursday week her remains were interred at Hale Chapel, where a representative gathering had assembled to pay the last tributes of love and respect. The Rev. Dendy Agate conducted a short service in the presence of the family at Rookwood, and also officiated at Hale Chapel, when he was assisted by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith. A large congregation of past and present scholars, teachers and friends, united in the memorial service held on the following Sunday evening at the Lower Mosley-street Sunday School. The service was conducted by the Rev. A. Cobden Smith, who, in the course of his address, paid a warm tribute to the departed scholar, teacher and friend of the school.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Time for Everything.

WHAT delightful things holidays are! Sometimes we fancy we could never have too many of them, and we are ready to ask—How could we ever tire of games and country rambles and perfect liberty?

But have you never found that there is another side to the question?

If all the year were playing holidays,
To sport would be as tedious as to work;
But when they seldom come, they wish'd for come.

So said Shakespeare, and the more we think about the matter the more thoroughly must we agree with him. And it is interesting to notice that the great poet put this saying into the mouth of the young Prince Henry, who afterwards became our Henry V. As a lad Henry was as fond as anyone of play and doing as he liked. But already he could see that, without times of steady work, play and liberty would themselves be very dull; and by the time he became King he had fully learned that the happiest thing was to do duties first and take pleasure afterwards. His duties were many, and hard, but he did them with all his might; and that was what made him a successful King and won him the respect of the people.

Now, few children in the world have the prospect of being king or queen, but all children who want to be happy and to make others happy must learn the truth which Prince Henry learnt. Even the animals teach it: every one of them has his work which he must not neglect; and how interesting it is to watch them at it, whenever we have time!

But that reminds me of three children who tried to make friends with the animals at the wrong time. The children were on their way to school. It was a fine summer's day, and it was so pleasant out of doors that they did not want to go in. The country looked very beautiful, and there seemed to be no work going on in it. "Oh, why should we work?" they said. "Let us go off to the woods and get the animals to join with us in play!" So away they went. Soon they found a beetle and made their request to him. "Oh, I've got something else to do," he replied; "I have to build a bridge with this grass."

Ants and bees are also busy builders and not one could the children find at leisure. A little mouse piped out that he was storing his house with food for the winter. A wood-pigeon softly pleaded that she had to keep her eggs warm. A chaffinch could hardly stop to give any answer; she already had a family to feed, and must use every moment catching flies.

In fact, the children found that the wood was not at all the idle place they had supposed; on the contrary, it was full of activity. They could find no creature which was not at its work, and not one was complaining. This experience put them into a different mood, and they went off to their lessons feeling ashamed of themselves for shirking, while creatures of lowlier power were faithfully working.

Let us hope that there is no animal which has not its playtime. Yes, but plainly they all have their duties, and they teach us as clearly as Shakespeare or Prince Henry, "Duty first, pleasure afterwards." As a writer said long, long ago, in the Bible, "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under heaven."

H. RAWLINGS.

A DREAM.

'MID city smoke I slept and dreamed a dream.
My spirit fled away
O'er the high hills to where there shone a gleam
Of silver on a little twinkling stream.
The skies had left their grey
Low-hanging o'er the town, and all was blue
And clear as love's own smile.
A nook refreshed with dew,
A bower shut in with newly-budded trees,
Enchained my feet awhile,
For there the cooling breeze
That dimpled all the surface of the brook
Stirred 'mongst the long, lush grass,
And faint primroses set so closely there
The feet could scarcely pass
Except to crush and bruise. A second look Revealed a host of other blossoms too.
Frail violets, unscented, but as fair
As amethysts bejewelling the dell;
And further up the bank tall cowslips grew
Where the broad field began;
And lower, where it fell
And dipped into the stream, the level span
Of rivulet and marsh on either hand
Was almost covered for a space with gold,
A sheet of royal kingcups there unrolled
In glory o'er the land.

A wind went singing low its tranquil tune
Away up a lovely hill that rose
In rounded outline 'gainst the sky of noon,
And messages from everything that grows
In secret nooks flew thither on its wing,
And far beyond, away into the west,
The wind alone knew where,
And 'midst that sweet, luxuriant blossoming
The hum of busy insects filled the air,
Plying their happy quest.

And it was all a vision, and I woke
Once more amid the smoke;
But in my mind the wonder dawned and grew,
Whether truth may not lie in things that seem,
Whether this city is but a dream,
And that sweet dream was true.

RELIGION is not the conception of God, but the love of Him. It is not the abstract idea of right, but the practical doing of right. It is not the absolute formula of truth, but the being true. The substance is more than the shadow.—Austin Garver.

LONDON, JULY 5, 1902.

AFTER SIXTY YEARS.

WE are very happy this week, when THE INQUIRER completes its first sixty years of service, to have received so many kindly and generous letters and messages of goodwill and of hope for the future, from friends in all parts of the country, and in other lands, where the movements of liberal religious thought and life are closely akin to our own.

If this were a personal matter, we might indeed be covered with confusion, and hide away the words of commendation so lavishly bestowed ; but a paper that is sixty years old, and has known how to bear some measure of "the world's buffets and scorns," while fully conscious of its own defects, is yet past blushing, and without immodesty can treasure up and openly display all the grateful and appreciative things which friends find it in their hearts to say.

There will be found in our present issue letters from old and tried friends, with interesting reminiscences of the earliest days of THE INQUIRER, and others from friends much more recently come within the circle of our religious fellowship. There are greetings from workers in other countries, whose confidence and goodwill it is an honour to possess, and whose good wishes are a great encouragement. And these which we publish this week are only a part of what we have received, so that our pleasure in this anniversary must overflow into next week ; and, indeed, it will extend much further, both the pleasure, and the new strength and gladness in this service, which such greetings must bring.

If we were to sum up all the good wishes, and try to harmonise all the aspirations of our friends for the future of THE INQUIRER, it might be difficult to form a clear and definite conception of the ideal at which we ought to aim ; and there is one point on which we ought perhaps at once to say a word. THE INQUIRER has from the first maintained, and felt it to be essential to maintain liberty to speak freely its convictions on burning questions of the hour, whether of social reform or of national or international politics, and has at the same time endeavoured to maintain a free platform for the expression of conflicting views on such questions, so that there might be full discussion with perfect fairness to both sides. But Mr. SMITH OSLER, in the first paragraph of his most welcome contribution, expresses the view, which we believe is somewhat widely held, that in a denominational organ there should be editorial neutrality, on such questions. That is a view we find it impossible to accept. On the Editor there may indeed be laid the difficult task of acting, to some extent, as judge, or chairman, in the conduct of such discussions, to secure a full hearing to both sides, and if he show partiality to either, he is unworthy of his place ; but none the less, in our view, he must be allowed, and should recognise the obligation, to express his own clear convictions. The great difficulty is to learn how to speak without offence, and to make it manifest that there is singleness of purpose in the endeavour after truth and right. If in recent discussions there has been anything in the tone of THE INQUIRER, which Mr. OSLER has regretted, which seemed to imply want of respect for the judgment of those who held opposite views, or any assumption of superior virtue or intelligence, that was not intended, and is utterly repugnant to the feeling and the principles in accordance with which we have endeavoured to conduct this Journal.

Another point is that raised by Miss FRANCES POWER COBBE, who with generous confidence in the future of THE INQUIRER asks whether the time is not come for it to abandon the rôle of "the Family Newspaper of Unitarians" and assume the position of the English organ of free Theology and Criticism.

With the desire for a wider range of service thus indicated, by which the cause of free spiritual religion in England should be advanced, we are in complete sympathy, and trust that it may be possible for us in the future to do far better and completer work than in the past. We are not content with any past achievement, but would humbly yet strenuously and earnestly press forward into a larger future. Generous friends are now rallying to the support of THE INQUIRER, that it may be better equipped to meet the growing needs of the day, that its outlook may be wider, its touch surer, and its grip upon the problems of thought and morals more firm and practical. Its aim is to serve universal human needs, both in the matter of progressive thought on the deepest questions of life, and in that of moral and social aspiration.

But at the same time it must be distinctly said that THE INQUIRER cannot relinquish its concurrent duty as "the Family Paper of Unitarians," as serving the special needs of Unitarians who have their home in Free Churches. It is an organ of those Churches. For that purpose it was founded, to give expression to what is best in their religious life, to strengthen the sense of unity and common purpose in the members of those Churches, and all who are drawn into sympathy with the aspirations and ideal of that Free Fellowship.

Happily there is nothing inconsistent here with the purpose of serving the cause of free Theology and Criticism and making contributions to free spiritual religion in England. The Churches, when true to their own ideal, and independent thinkers and workers in other circles or in solitary places, are at one in those high ends, which it will be our constant aim to further ; and for our own part we are convinced, that one of the best services to be rendered to progressive thought and to free spiritual religion, is to prove that their natural expression is in the strong and helpful life of a Free Church, that they serve to cement a true union in worship, in loyalty to the loftiest ideal, and are potent as inspirers of all good work.

We have therefore a two-fold appeal to make at this moment of thankful retrospect, and of fresh consecration for better service in the time to come. To those who are not of the immediate fellowship of our Free Churches,—to recognise that those Churches have a place in the religious life of England and a duty which cannot be neglected, which we must share with them, while at the same time their special concerns are only a part, though a needed part, of a larger whole. Thus we beg of all other friends, of their charity to have patience with what may appear to them somewhat small parochial gossip, while they find, as we trust they surely will, much in THE INQUIRER that meets their own needs and serves the larger cause to which they and the members of our Churches are alike devoted. And to the members of our Free Churches we appeal to rejoice with us in the wider outlook, in which we shall continue as in the past to find the breath of our best life, to let the great ideal and the lofty spirit of a Catholic Fellowship breathe through all that is said and done in our Churches, and as far as possible to see to it that the news of our Churches shall be of real moment, and worthy of public attention. With the highest aim we shall best do the humblest work, and perchance accomplish far more than we have dreamed.

We will not begin here a confession of manifold shortcomings, but shall spend these summer months in maturing plans for a genuine advance, which may render THE INQUIRER more worthy of the place it holds in the affections of our people, a more capable exponent of their principles, a better servant of the cause of Truth and Spiritual Freedom, of Christian Brotherhood and sincere religious life.

GREETINGS, COUNSEL AND GOOD WISHES.

THE approaching 60th anniversary of the issue of the first number of THE INQUIRER claims, I think, a special notice from the numerous friends and readers of that paper.

On looking back to July 9, 1842, we elders cannot help being struck with the great contrast between that time and the present, as judged by the advance that has taken place in all phases of liberal thought and action, both political, educational and religious.

This wonderful development, due primarily to many minds and many varied schools of thought, has been consistently aided and advanced by the efforts of the various able editors of THE INQUIRER during the period. THE INQUIRER may therefore well claim its full share of credit in this continuous advance of liberal religious thought.

No doubt it was this feeling of assurance of the importance and value of THE INQUIRER in the large field of liberal progress that induced so many friends to come forward in 1885 to purchase the paper from private hands and make it a public concern and care.

Since that event, several instances have occurred to show, that the friends of the paper still exercise that concern and care, —long may it be so—as it promises a continued career of usefulness and vigour, and for this on its anniversary, it has the hearty good wishes of one of its late directors.

DAVID MARTINEAU.

YOU ask me for some reminiscences of the early days of THE INQUIRER. I have before me a letter, Dec., 1842, from the first Editor, the Rev. William Hincks, who, when Manchester College left York to return to Manchester, came to London and took charge of the Stamford-street pulpit. In this letter he says that he has become the sole proprietor, and asks my uncle to be one of his office guarantors to secure the government duty of one penny on each copy. In those days the taxes on knowledge had not been repealed (see THE INQUIRER, No. 512, Parliamentary debate); besides the penny stamp upon all papers, there was the advertisement duty and a duty upon paper—all acting against cheap popular literature—the price of THE INQUIRER was sixpence, and the penny newspaper stamp acted as a frank to allow of papers being reposted.

The paper has done signal service in the interests of liberal religion and its votaries, who unlike other sects or denominations, had no representative central body of delegates; those who joined the Unitarian Association found it to be only a friendly co-operation of individuals.

Before the issue of THE INQUIRER there was a want of some means of information of what was being said and done in the country, though it is true that some monthlies gave belated reports of meetings.

Now for sixty years THE INQUIRER has helped to meet this want. I venture to think that it has still an increasing field of usefulness before it in focussing those higher interests of human religious life, which are beginning to unfold with the progress of time. My best wishes go out to you for a prosperous future.

STEPHEN S. TAYLER.

I CERTAINLY wish continued usefulness to THE INQUIRER. Unhappily, thousands of men and women do not, from various causes, find their souls' need satisfied by the prayers and preaching of the so-called "Orthodox" churches. Many of these, however, have found that need satisfied in the Unitarian churches. THE INQUIRER has for sixty years brought salvation to these earnest and honest searchers after truth, men of a very exceptional and noble type. During many of these sixty years, I have found help and comfort from the writings of the noble teachers who have contributed to its columns; and I thank them from the depth of my heart, whether they still dwell on this earth or have joined the company of the Blessed.

This anniversary of THE INQUIRER awakens many a happy and tender memory, for I was present at its birth. I was then living in the house of the Rev. William Hincks, in Torrington-square; and I remember him as if I saw him yesterday —a perfervid Belfast man, full of zeal and enthusiasm for all religious, social, and political progress; withal a naturalist, and lover of botany. Other students of University College were also living in his house. If I remember aright, Justice Wills, who is still with us, my friends, John Langton Sanford (author of a remarkable book on Cromwell) and the present Sir Francis Wm. Brady, a holder of more than one judicial office in Ireland, as young now as he was then; also, I think, Colfox and Paget, of Leicester, who have gone before us. How merrily we talked and laughed at the dining-table over the forthcoming event—discussions in which Mrs. Hincks and her handsome sons and daughters all took part with Irish vivacity and wit. Happy days. I remember that one point discussed was whether the new journal should be spelled with an "I" or an "E," the gentlemen being for the former and the ladies for the latter. The new editor called upon Brady and myself to send in contributions to the columns, and each of us appeared in print for the first time: the sensation was delightful. Brady wrote an article headed: "Cleanliness next to Godliness," while I wrote one on the new Pentonville Model Prison, which I had just visited—as an amateur, be it well understood.

June 30. HODGSON PRATT.

THE INQUIRER is closely associated with my youth, and is separated in my feelings and thoughts from the flock which covers the pastures of journalism. Many eminent men have I known in half a century spent in the thick of the daily Press, but not one of the number stands out in my memory in a kindlier light than does the figure of Mr. Lalor, who for too brief a period conducted THE INQUIRER, and who trained my untutored mind in criticism and the writing of "leaders." Indeed, I fear the files of the paper at one stage would show the need of his judgment, his wide knowledge, his delicate and sensitive literary taste. Before his day we were often dependent upon volunteer aid, and I think you must know how hazardous that is. I fleshed my untried weapon on books—the first review I ever wrote was in THE INQUIRER, of the life of John Howard, by Hepworth Dixon — and revelled with a boy's enthusiasm in extravagant radical comments upon the news of the day. One morning a greatly-respected minister from the country called at the old office in Green Arbour Court, and stopped to chat. In the course of our talk he suddenly said, "Who is it, by the way, writes your reviews?" My eyes glistened. "Do you like them?" I asked. "Well, they are evidently written," was his reply "by somebody who is very young." He was right, but it rankled.

Mr. Lalor was a permanent invalid, and after a time, under his supervision, more and more of the work of the paper fell to my share, but what a training it was! High flown passages of which I was so proud were planed away; hasty estimates of men and things revised; the feverishness taken from impetuous enthusiasm, and he sympathised with you so all the while! Distinguished men often sat in his room at Hampstead. His pale emaciated face shone with the light of high thoughts. There is a sketch in one of Sir E. B. Lytton's collection of essays called "The New Phædo"; he gives the "conversations with L." That, of course, was not Mr. Lalor, but it reminds me of him.

The editorial changes to which the paper was subject, carried with them changes of policy. During part of the period of the American Civil War, THE INQUIRER defended the cause of the North, and during the rest it supported the cause of the South. At the time of the coup d'etât an extremely able defence of the crime appeared in THE INQUIRER from the pen of Mr. Walter Bagehot, and at other moments the French Empire and its suppression of liberty had no severer censor than the organ of the body who are bound by every tradition to stand in the front in favour of independence and freedom.

Though I stepped into secular journalism soon after Mr. Lalor's lamented loss, I kept for a while a thread of connection with THE INQUIRER. My association with the Rev. T. L. Marshall will be remembered by him. It is a pleasure to still see contributions from his clear, shrewd, penetrating mind in the columns of the paper which he edited with such industry and devotion.

At no part of its history has THE INQUIRER commended itself more intimately to my mind and my judgment, than during the last few years. The spirit in which discussions are conducted, the generous and manly treatment of other religious bodies than Unitarian, and the high value of the general contents give THE INQUIRER a distinguished place in the ranks of the religious journals of the Empire. Amongst them it can teach rather than imitate.

JOHN R. ROBINSON.

THOUGH I have sometimes regretted the tone of "THE INQUIRER" upon a subject on which persons not wholly undeserving of respect have taken an opposite view to your own, and must also confess that I think editorial neutrality on burning political questions should be the rule in a denominational organ, I not only offer my heartiest congratulations and good wishes on the occasion of your diamond jubilee, but am sincerely rejoiced that the general character of your paper as a vehicle of religious and philosophical thought is not to be altered.

I have too many early associations with "THE INQUIRER" to feel indifferent to its continuance and success. Four names especially stand out in my memory in connection with it at a time when I was myself an occasional contributor. The "editor" was John Langton Sanford, a man whose researches into the materials for the history of the Great Rebellion buried in the British Museum, the Bodleian Library and the Record Tower of Dublin Castle would have brought him a larger meed of fame than he ever attained, if his own modesty and the fear of pecuniary risk in publishing had not caused his most original results to be anticipated by others. Of his coadjutor, Richard Holt Hutton, who became one of the most influential journalists of his time, I need not speak. Less widely known, but the idol of his own circle, the subtlest of critics, and the writer of some sonnets which no collection of nineteenth century sonnets will omit, was William Caldwell Roscoe; and he, too, was one of your young men. The fourth name is that of Walter Bagehot, whose principal books have been translated into most European languages, and whose wise and brilliant sayings, written and spoken, are constantly being quoted to this day. He was not a regular contributor, but the graphic and audacious letters which he wrote from Paris at the time of Louis Napoleon's coup d'état, and which are reprinted in his works, first appeared in your columns.

Alas! these men of future eminence did not give satisfaction to the Unitarian world of their day, or fulfil the prevailing ideal of a denominational organ, and, looking back, I cannot pretend to be surprised at it. As Hutton says of their action in his memoir of Bagehot, "only a denomination of 'just men,' trained in tolerance for generations, and in that respect, at least, made all but 'perfect,' would have endured it at all." The then proprietor did not, in fact, endure it more than a certain time, and there had to be a revolution in the management.

This experience of half-a-century ago helps me, I think, to feel a degree of sympathy with each side in some recent discussions. Once more, my best wishes and auguries for your future.

T. Smith Osler.

Hampstead.

I understand that, like Waverley, The Inquirer may now begin its history with "'Tis sixty years since." We will not say wickedly (as Byron did of George the Fourth's visit to Ireland), "He comes in the promise and bloom of threescore—" for a newspaper at that respectable age, instead of being passé and hopeless, has just attained its majority, and given proof of its right to be heard in the councils of the community. I rejoice to believe that The Inquirer, which thus "comes of age" this week, has before it a long manhood of honour and public service.

May I, with all diffidence and respect, presume to offer the suggestion that it is now the moment to decide whether it should remain (what I may call) the Family Paper of Unitarians, or assume the position of the English organ of free Theology and Criticism for all the multitudinous readers, inside and outside the orthodox Churches, who share in the main the religious views and reverent sentiments of the leaders of Unitarianism? That there is room for such a journal now, and that it might easily become a power in the land, is as certain as that such room did not exist sixty years ago; an epoch, as I well remember, when I had myself just escaped out of the doors of the Church of England and looked round almost in vain for any comrades of my mental solitude. To produce a weekly paper which shall supply us all, whatever we call ourselves, whose minds are occupied with the great problems of theology, and who are interested in the results of the stupendous work of Higher Criticism now in progress, with the information which we want, and the arguments which we desire to study, would be an immense boon to many of us. It is impossible also to doubt that the existence of such a journal would soon prove of inestimable service to the whole cause of free spiritual religion in England.

With cordial wishes for the success of your paper, under whatever name it may continue to work,—

Frances Power Cobbe.

Hengwrt, Dolgelly.

Heartily do I welcome The Inquirer into the ranks of the sexagenarians! "Sixty! Why its the prime of life," said one of the best known and hardest working of my colleagnes. Heartily do I say, Amen, to the sentiment; but alas! as he and I know well, some qualifications must be admitted. Worst of them all is the undeniable fact that the sixties are on the way to the seventies, and the seventies to the eighties, when even a Martineau must admit that the prime is long past. Of Moses, indeed, it is written that at the age of 120, "his eye was not dim nor his natural force abated," but the evidence is not contemporary, and we must be allowed a doubt whether the age is wrongly stated or his strength exaggerated, or both alike mythical. Certainly we cannot hope to die so old and so young as he.

But, oh happy Inquirer! in your case there is no threatening future to abate the pride of 60 years accomplished, setting you so far on in the ranks of journalism; years upon which you may look back with compassion or scorn for the thousand attempts made and ended since you began your course. No reason why you should not double your life time, and your eye be as keen to discern wrong and falsehood, and your force as certain to attack at 120 as now or ever it has been. The youngest of your contributors will long have ceased to write, but their children's children will have inherited their love of free speech and fair play and spiritual religion, and many brought up in a narrower faith will join themselves to these, and they will need you as much as do we now.

You, and not another organ, for you will own then more than you do even now the inestimable advantage of a tradition of service in the cause of free and reverent enquiry. Readers grumble at you as they always have done and will do, for are we not on your own principles free to grumble and to criticise, and we do but exercise that right of which you are the defendant. But let them support and they will improve you. Who expects to get a perfect portrait painted for £50, or a great cause fitly maintained on a subscription list which would not be a sufficient fee to retain a great advocate for a single case?

You have lived through two generations, this generation will not let you die; and those who come after will be the more bound to your support because of the more years of unabated advocacy of all they value most which you will have to boast of then. Go on, ever young, change with the changing times, learn the new things yet hidden from us and unlearn old errors we yet mistake for truth, but be ever constant to the old profession, "A Journal of Liberal Religious Thought and Life," by whatever names these may from time to time be called!

Charles Hargrove.

It is hardly likely that many of your readers have diligently perused The Inquirer since its foundation in 1842. But that is my case, and I may add that, both as manager for the late Mr. Thomas Forrest and on my own account, I have had to do with the publication of it in Manchester from its first number. It has not always been my good fortune to agree on all points with its successive editors; but I have uniformly regarded it as a valuable contributor to the progress of enlightened and liberal views of theology and religion. I sincerely wish for it a prosperous future. Harry Rawson.

Eccles.

Having been a gratified reader of The Inquirer from its commencement in 1842, I desire to offer my hearty good wishes for the continued and increasing prosperity of the journal and its editor.

G. Bewlay Dalby.

Birkenhead, June 30.

My interest in The Inquirer dates from its commencement, when my father took an active part in its starting. And five years later he entered into correspondence with all the ministers of our denomination with a view to its permanent establishment. So I have followed it through all these sixty years, but never with such entire sympathy as during the last four years. Trusting you will have the cordial support of present friends and many new ones, Mary A. Estlin.

Clifton.

My dear Inquirer. — Like Mrs. Barbauld and Life, we've been long together through pleasant and through cloudy weather. Though I am a few years your senior, we seem to have been lifelong friends. My mother, ἁγιωτάτη τὴν μνήμην, used to study your pages diligently, and made familiar to my young ears the names of some of our worthy English ministers; and it was a great day when any of the said ministers came over to Dublin to preach in our dull old meeting-house. And now you have actually reached the mature age of sixty; but, notwithstanding your years, while I am sinking down into the vale, you spring up in perpetual youth, and are as eager as ever to lead men into the promised land. It is a grand thing to have the wisdom of age combined with the energy of youth; and notwithstanding my seniority, my wearied brain is quite incapable of offering advice to a friend at once so venerable and so young. But from my heart I wish you a long life of ever-increasing usefulness, and trust that you will never shrink from giving your advocacy to every righteous and holy cause, and, without any deterioration in your high aims, that you will adapt yourself to changing needs, and apply the same great principles of Christian truth and freedom to the various questions which press themselves on public attention.

With hearty congratulations and joyful hopes, believe me, dear INQUIRER, your old and attached friend,

JAMES DRUMMOND.

Oxford, June 27.

AND SO THE INQUIRER completes this month its sixtieth year. It was started in July, 1842. Think what vast strides civil and religious liberty has made since then. In 1842 the parliamentary franchise was still restricted: there was no vote by ballot: many boroughs were still unreformed. There was no Public Health Act; no Medical Officer of Health; no School Board; no State Education; no County Council; no Local Board. The older Universities were closed to Dissenters; yet Dissenters were still compelled to pay Church rates. The title of Unitarians to occupy their ancient meeting houses had just been shattered by the decision of the House of Lords with respect to Lady Hewley's Trust. These things have all been changed, but only as the result of constant unremitting struggle. And in this struggle THE INQUIRER has always bravely borne its humble part. There is much yet to be done in the cause of civil and religious liberty: much yet to be done to diffuse the knowledge of Christianity in its simplest and most intelligible form. Continue in that work, Mr. Editor, with good heart and courage; you have the good wishes of a wide circle of friends; let your paper still be the home of free religious thought, the treasury of the reverent inquirer after truth; approach new problems in the old spirit; and you will thus render yeoman service to the cause of humanity and of God.

W. BLAKE ODGERS.

I HAVE the utmost pleasure in joining with other members of our band of Churches in wishing to the paper which for sixty years has been an organ representing their best thought and life a career of renewed influence and prosperity. It has filled an important place in our midst, doing much to unite us in our various communities throughout the country in one religious commonwealth. In its pages we have had the records of our chief gatherings, and thus the leaders of our Churches, addressing no mere local audiences, have spoken to fellow-seekers for truth and light, and fellow-servants of God and man, in church after church. Interest has been quickened in the larger Church life to which all belong, and the best thought of the finest minds and spirits amongst us has permeated it. This function of THE INQUIRER, as reporter of our meetings, enabling those who speak to speak to our Churches at large, is far from the least that it fulfils, and I am confident that the more adequately it finds room in its columns for reports of the best utterances of our leading ministers the greater will be its hold upon our people, and the larger will be its circulation in congregations and local associations whose interest will also be quickened by the insertion of their own local intelligence. Nothing is more deeply needed for the life of our Churches than the circulation throughout them of the spirit of a common life, creating a larger sense in all of them of sharing in one great cause. There is too much of a merely local interest, especially in our newly-founded congregations, many of whose members are entirely without knowledge of our traditions, and without hereditary interest in our community. It is much to be desired that THE INQUIRER should enter the homes of all these, and introduce them, week by week, to the life and thought and aims of the various Churches and missionary societies whose proceedings it reports.

No less important a service rendered by THE INQUIRER has been the absolutely unfettered liberty of discussion of all questions at issue in our Churches that has characterised its pages. Many a vital controversy has been conducted by our ablest men, cleric and lay, to the great clearing of the air, and to the wide enlightenment of our people. I heartily congratulate THE INQUIRER on the bold stand it has ever taken for freedom of statement of all opinions, and on its complete impartiality in the insertion of letters from its correspondents. A paper like THE INQUIRER for the conduct of free debate amongst us is essential to our life.

I also pay my tribute to the high excellence of its literary, theological, and scholarly reviews and essays. They may not have added to its popularity with its general readers, but they have raised its character as a source of light and leading to the best thought in our midst.

I have been one of those who have also admired the tone of the Editorial leaders on all questions relating to the life and thought and principles that find a home in our Churches, and I have not regarded articles, applying our moral and religious principles to public affairs as overstepping the limits of the Editor's functions.

H. ENFIELD DOWSON.

To be, de facto, a denominational weekly, and yet to be, at the same time, a newspaper representing views and aspirations which transcend all mere denominational frontiers: such has been the position of THE INQUIRER for the last sixty years—a position of much honour and no small difficulty. It would be easy for anyone to speak of the many drawbacks, and shortcomings, and inconsistencies which, during all these years, must inevitably have stood in the way of complete success; but, at such a time as this, our friends will only care to record their admiration for the work done and their gratitude for the mental and moral help derived from it. In the past THE INQUIRER has been what it only could be: the expression of what we are, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we may surely trust that a new period of ever-increasing efficiency and usefulness will make THE INQUIRER more and more a witness in the religious world to those truths for which our churches have stood alone so long.

L. DE B. KLEIN.

Liverpool.

SIXTY years! THE INQUIRER is getting old in the service—old, yet young, with that haleness and heartiness that belonged to Moses when he ascended the Mount. Of its early readers few survive to-day; but while the veterans doff their armour and pass on, THE INQUIRER continues fighting the good fight of freedom, faith and character.

Its readers, while claiming free thought as their birthright, endeavour in practice to extend their sympathy not only to the right wing of the army, but also to that which they may not deem right, feeling if they did not their freethought must prove a huge sham.

The Editor needs the help of all, but amid the multitude of counsellors, he will do well to remember his Æsop and act accordingly. Unitarian editors do not profess omniscience, neither do they claim infallibility; but they have generally been single-minded and true to the interests of the cause, holding the balance fairly between the various and conflicting forms of thought that prevail among us.

THE INQUIRER has been a good minister's paper, helpful in the noblest sense—introducing him to the best literature of the day and enabling him to cope more or less successfully with many a thorny question. It has sometimes "reasoned high of fixed fate, free-will and knowledge absolute," but its discourse has more often been of things more sweet.

May its good traditions be continued, and its next sixty years find it improved in every respect. May its staff grow stronger yearly, its circulation larger; and may it prove to pulpit and pew, and increasingly to the family circle, the necessary guide, philosopher and friend.

Aberdare. R. J. JONES.

REMEMBRANCE of good service rendered by faithful men, in the direction of religious and social progress, cannot but deepen our desire that there may await THE INQUIRER years of added usefulness. Still can we reckon among the friends yet spared to us, one who, in season and out of season, embodied the best traditions of religious journalism. It is no mean wish, that THE INQUIRER may be stamped with the spirit of catholicity, of true religious liberalism, and of unfailing tact, which marked the editorship of our venerable friend, the Rev. Thomas Lethbridge Marshall, for so long a period, out of the sixty years of life now credited to the paper.

That the humblest advocate of a deserving cause may find a welcome to its columns, and that opportunities may, as of old, be frankly given to the expression of sincere convictions, however diverse, on all grave questions touching our religious life and position, is my sincere desire.

AMBROSE N. BLATCHFORD.

A GOOD deal of history has been made since THE INQUIRER celebrated its fiftieth birthday, and yet how short this decade seems to have been! THE INQUIRER has opened a new chapter in its own history; and now the outlook is full of great possibilities, which the Editor and his helpers will assuredly make actual if they can.

In the lives of individuals these festivals, "golden" or "diamond," as we may call them, cannot be wholly free from a certain pathetic element, for they register the passage of years, the full tale of which has its natural limit. In the case of a journal it is quite otherwise. Long as it lives, it is under no necessity of growing old. It is the real phœnix. As one form perishes in the flames, another appears. New writers supersede the old, and new readers are sought and found. Men, being themselves mortal, are thus able to bestow immortality on works of common enterprise. Adopting a wise man's expression, we may say, therefore, that THE INQUIRER is now "sixty years young." Its anxious guardians know well enough that it is liable to the ailments of youth, that it requires much sustenance, and that its "ways" are apt to be somewhat wilful. But, the higher qualities of youth being visible also, these must compensate for the others.

Amid all the changes in the management of the journal, I believe it has remained true to the quest of truth which used to be indicated in its motto taken from the writings of Marcus Aurelius. In that quest I trust it may go on, and grow younger and stronger every year, more fearless, more charming, as becomes a bon enfant. The wise and prudent may be shocked occasionally, with advantage. So, at least, one of the readers of THE INQUIRER thinks, who, if he rarely feels shocked at it, must leave the inference to others.

W. G. TARRANT.

A hearty greeting from the Far North to the good old INQUIRER on attaining its Diamond Jubilee! I cannot allow such a special occasion to pass even in the busy times of holidays without a word of salutation and goodwill. For half the period of THE INQUIRER's life I have been a regular reader of its pages, and for a quarter of a century an occasional contributor. I daresay my contributions, like those of some others I could name, have at times been dull. In this respect there is room for improvement; and, as age brings experience, I daresay we shall get it after sixty years. In one direction, however, scarcely any improvement is possible—THE INQUIRER gives its contributors the fullest liberty of expression. Otherwise, it would belie its name; for it is nothing if not a seeker after truth, and freedom is a condition necessary for the attainment of truth, just as the truth itself will make us free. God speed the good old paper in its new career; may it renew its youth like the eagle.

C. J. STREET.

Loch Maree, N.B., June 25.

DEAR INQUIRER,—The heart of the third generation turns to you reverently as you look wistfully forward, while the memories of "grand historic years" throng in your mind. May your future be in the "path that shineth more and more unto the perfect day!"

In the history of religious movement sixty years are only a heart-throb, but in the period of your literary service the heart of religion felt many wondrous emotions. It was wrung by spasms of departure from opinions that had proved too strait and yet were intertwined with fibres of thought and veins of life; and it throbbed with ardours of expectation as the life prospect presented by Science opened in its infinite amplitude and wealth.

For heart-culture such a journal as yours has become essential. The theology of the chair has largely taken the place of that of the pulpit. The preacher is supplemented, if not supplanted, by the paragraphist.
